New Series, | No. 86.

BEADLE'S

No. 407.

Name Novelle

The Blue Clipper.

Popular Dime Hand-Books.

BEADLE AND ADAMS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK.

Each volume 100 12mo. pages, sent post-paid on receipt of price-ten cents each.

STANDARD SCHOOL SERIES.

DIME SPEAKERS. 1. Dime American Speaker. 2. Dime National Speaker. 3. Dime Patriotic Speaker.

4. Dime Comic Speaker.

5. Dime Elecutionist. 6. Dime Humorous Speaker.

7. Dime Standard Speaker. 8. Dime Stump Speaker. 9. Dime Juvenile Speaker.

10. Dime Spread-eagle Speaker. 11. Dime Debater and Chairman's Guide.

12. Dime Exhibition Speaker.

13. Dime School Speaker. 14. Dime Ludicrons Speaker.

15. Carl Pretzel's Komikal Speaker

16. Dime Youth's Speaker. 17. Dime Eloquent Speaker.

18. Dime Hall Columbia Speaker. 19. Dime Serio-Comic Speaker.

20. Dime Select Speaker.

Dime Melodist. (Music and Words.) School Melodist. (Music and Words.)

Dime Dialogues Number Oue. Dime Dialogues Number Two. Dime Dialogues Number Three. Dime Dialogues Number Four. Dime Dialogues Number Five. Dime Dialogues Number Six. Dime Dialogues Number Seven. Dime Dialogues Number Eight. Dime Dialogues Number Nine. Dime Dialogues Number Ten. Dime Dialogues Number Eleven. Dime Dialogues Number Twelve. Dime Dialogues Number Thirteen.

DIME DIALOGUES.

Dime Dialogues Number Fourteen. Dime Dialognes Number Fifteen. Dime Dialogues Number Sixteen.

Dime Dialogues Number Seventeen. Dime Dialogues Number Eighteen. Dime Dialognes Number Vineteen. Dime Dialogues Number Twenty.

Dime Dialogues Number Twenty-one.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SERIES.

1 -DIME GENTS' LETTER-WRITER-Embracing Forms, Models, Suggestions and Rules for the use of all classes, on all occasions.

2-DIME BOOK OF ETIQUETTE-For Ladies and Gentlemen : being a Guide to True Gentility and Good-Breeding, and a Directory to the Usages of society. 3-DIME BOOK OF VERSES-Comprising Verses for Valentines, Mottoes, Couplets, St. Valentine Verses, Bridal and Marriage Verses, Verses of Love, etc. 4-DIME BOOK OF DREAMS-Their Roman ce and Mystery; with a complete interpreting Dictionary. Compiled from the most accredited sources.

5-DIME FORTUNE-TELLER-Comprising the art of Fortune-Telling, how to read Character, etc.

6-DIME LADIES' LETTER-WRITER-Giving the various forms of Letters of School Days, Love and Friendship, of Society, etc.

7-DIME LOVERS' CASKET-A Treatise and Guide to Friendship, Love, Courtship and Marriage. Embracing also a complete Floral Dictionary, etc.

8-DIME BALL-ROOM COMPANION-And Guide to Dancing. Giving rules of Etiquette, hints on Private Parties, toilettes for the Ball-room, etc.

9-BOOK OF 100 GAMES-Out-door and In-door SUMMER GAMES for Tourists and Families in the Country, Pienics, etc., comprising 100 Games, Forfeits, etc.

10 -DIME CHESS INSTRUCTOR-A complete hand-book of instruction, giving the entertaining mysteries of this most interesting and fascinating of games.

11-DIME BOOK OF CROQUET-A complete guide to the game, with the latest rules, diagrams, Croquet Dictionary, Parlor Croquet, etc.

12-DIME BOOK OF BEAUTY-A delightful book, full of interesting informstion. It deserves a place in the hands of every one who would be beautiful.

DIME ROBINSON CRUSOE-In large octavo, double columns, illustrated.

FAMOURY SERIES.

1. DIME COOK BOOK.

2. DIME RECIPE BOOK. 3. DIME HOUSEWIFE'S MANUAL 4. DIME FAMILY PHYSICIAN.

5. DIME DRESSMALING AND MIL LINERY.

The above books are sold by Newsdealers everywhere, or will be sent, postpoid to any address, on receipt of price, 10 cents each. BEADLE & ADAMS. Publishers, 98 William Street, New York. the state of the s

BLUE CLIPPER:

OB,

THE SMUGGLER SPY.

BY ROGER STARBUCK,

ATT UNICONSTRUCTION OF STREET OF STREET AND SO ASSESSED AND THE AUTHOR OF THE FOLLOWING DIME NOVELS.

371. FOUL-WEATHER JACK.

390. Shadow Jack.

379. THE PHANTOM SHIP.

395. BLUE ANCHOR.

383. THE SPECTER SKIPPER.

401. THE ICE FIEND.

BEADLE AND ADAMS, PUBLISHERS,

98 WILLIAM STREET.

EADLE AND COMPANY,

In the office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington

BLUE CLIPPER.

CHAPTER I.

THE RENDEZVOUS IN THE HILLS.

ABOUT sixty miles to the south of Vera Cruz, near the coast of Mexico, a tall mountain rears its head, which, seen from the ocean, presents a grand appearance.

A number of conically shaped rocks, abounding in hollows and cavernous retreats, extend sloping from the main peak toward the Mexican Gulf, forming a sort of semicircle, which nearly incloses a small bay at this point.

Among these rocks, when the wind is strong, and the white seas send the spray careering half-way up their summits, few navigators would dare to venture.

Up to the middle of the year 18—, however, the pearl-fisher would occasionally resort here for the treasures of the deep. One night a column of lurid flame and smoke was seen bursting from one of the peaks, followed by a succession of deafening reports that made every rock in the bay tremble as if about falling to pieces.

The frightened pearl-fishers, together with the natives inhabiting this part of the coast, fled, fearing an explosion or an earthquake. The phenomenon occurring at intervals after ward, they removed altogether from this locality, deeming it too perilous for occupation.

Among the rocks, guiding a small skiff, on a clear evening in 18—, was a man enveloped in a cloak. The tide was run ning strong, yet so skillfully was the light craft directed, that she scarcely seemed to feel the influence of the current.

Reaching a strip of beach at the base of one of the rocks, the man, securing his skiff, mounted the elevation.

At the top there was an opening, through which he descended by means of a rope ladder to the distance of ten feet.

The lower end of the rope touched a rugged floor of rock, as was shown by the sound of the man's feet upon it. All was darkness here. Out of this darkness a rough voice said:

" Is that you, Wilkins?"

" Ay, ay."

Instantly a lantern flashed, revealing the face and garb of the speaker. He wore a Guernsey shirt, a glazed hat and duck pants, the latter confined round the waist by a belt, in which were a long horn-handled knife and a pistol. The face was severe and stern, the eyes black and sunken, the forehead low, cheeks bearded.

His first movement was to haul down the rope, his next to pass through a narrow passage on the right, leading so nearly perpendicularly downward, that both he and his follower were obliged to walk carefully, to keep from stumbling.

Threading this passage, fully sixteen yards long, they reached a rock-ribbed apartment, in every respect resembling a large cavern, except that the floor was boarded, and neat shelves, holding miscellaneous articles, ranged along the walls.

It was about thirty by forty feet in size, and lighted by several iron lamps, secured to the wall. Around the base of these walls were benches, upon which sat, reclined and slept about sixty rough fellows, their reckless, dare-devil looks matching with those of him who had just arrived. While the garb of all—consisting mostly of dark flaunel shirts, and canvas pants—was nearly alike, their faces were of varied types—Spanish, American, English and Mexican.

Meanwhile he who had been termed Wilkins, following his conductor to a deserted angle of the apartment, where there was a small table, sat down thereby, where a conversation in a low voice took place between the two.

Wilkins wore a mask, which he did not once remove. His face, therefore, was invisible, but the broad, muscular figure and well turned limbs told of youth and strength.

"So Government is fitting out more cruisers after us, you say—eh, Wilkins?"

"Ay, sy, Captain Malo; and my advice to you is to look out for yourself."

"Blast me, if I ain't half a mind to turn from smuggling to piracy!" said Captain Malo; "might as well be hung for a sheep as a lamb. Don't know, though, but what smuggling pays the best."

" It certainly does. Your last speculation was a good one

I hope you will be able to square accounts with me."

"I always pay my debts," answered the captain, laughing "especially to such a useful ally as yourself. My next 'spec' will be the running of a heavy cargo of sugar up the Missis sippi. Mind you keep your eye on me!"

As he spoke, he deposited in the visitor's hand a bag, the clinking of which betrayed the nature of its contents. Wilkins received it with a sigh of satisfaction.

"Now, then, how about that other business? Did you try

"Ay, ay. I sounded him, carefully at first, getting bolder as I proceeded."

" The result?"

"Well, at first he seemed the pink of honesty, etc., do you see, but thinking I could detect through all this, by the sparkle of the young fellow's eye— By the way, he was a blasted fine-looking chap, and has a wonderfully penetrating sort of eye, which seems to go right through you, and—"

"Confound it, man !" exclaimed the other, impatiently-

" never mind about his eye, but proceed."

"Well, then, seeing he kind of admired the free, jovial smuggler life, I kept on, and finally I actually won from him a half consent to join us."

"Good! Ho! ho! Mr. Harry Wand."

The conversation was continued.

Finally Wilkins rose to leave.

"Men," shouted Captain Malo, to the rough band ranged about the benches, "three cheers for the man who helps us under double colors!"

From the benches the whole band sprung simultaneously, cheering until the roof of the cavern rung!

" Death to the traitor who should betray him!"

Three more cheers. The swarthy Spaniards crossed knives, the Mexicans showed their teeth, the Americans turned their heads sideways, the Englishmen growled like bull-dogs. Wilkins then bowed and departed, passing through the opening in the top of the peak by means of a long stiff rope ladder.

Just as he gained the outside of the bay, the whole mass o' rocks was lighted by a lurid gleam, a heavy, rumbling sound was heard, and smoke and fire-flashes were seen to issue from one of the conical peaks.

Wilkins now pulled several miles until he glided alongside a small sloop—a mere sail-boat in size.

"Well, señor, did you see the volcano?" said the Spanish captain of the little craft. "Did you satisfy yourself that it's there?"

"Ay, ay; but come, my good fellow, trim your sails, and away we go. This is not a safe place for any craft."

"Right, señor," answered the captain.

As he spoke, he trimmed, with the help of a lad with him, the little craft, which was soon gliding northward.

CHAPTER II.

AN UNEXPECTED VISITOR.

On the morning after the scene described, a revenue cutter the Roland by name, went bowling out of the harbor of Vera Cruz, with the stars and stripes at her mizzen.

The cutter was a neat-looking craft, carrying several guns. She had a spanking breeze, which filled her mainsail and her canvas forward, sending her gallantly upon her course, which was in the direction of New Orleans.

Her captain, a young man of twenty-five, walked his decl with quick strides, apparently buried in deep thought. Although rather sharp featured, he was not unhandsome, while his frame, strong and muscular, betokened strength.

The cutter was about two leagues from land when a vessel was sighted in the distance, proving to be a cutter much like the one already described.

She was the United States revenue cutter the Argus, one of the many, which, at that period, were cruising, to break up an extensive system of smuggling secretly carried on along the gulf coasts.

The outlaws, however, were so cunning that, with the exbaffled every effort of the Government at detection.

The usual signals were exchanged, the two veseles hove to, and a boat put off from the stranger, was soon alongside the other.

In the stern-sheets was the commander, who, boarding, seemed well acquainted with the captain.

"Seen any thing yet, Watson," he inquired.

- "Nothing, particular. A suspicious-looking schooner was sighted, a day or two ago. We chased her, but couldn't overhaul."
 - "Ay, ay, they are sharp fellows. Where bound now?"

"To New Orleans, to recruit."

"So am I. As the wind is fair, too, I must not delay. Mr. Wand," he added, beckoning to a fine-looking young mid-shipman, of twenty or thereabouts, who had accompanied him, "get the boat ready."

"Ay, ay, sir," answered the youth, coloring, as he touched his cap to Watson, who had bowed to him.

"That young fellow," remarked Captain Bond, "is a puzzle to me—of late he has seemed so absent and thoughtful."

" How long have you noticed this change?"

"Ever since we last sailed from New Orleans. I half believe he is in love with that northern beauty there—Mary Clare. I have seen them together."

"Do you really think so?"

- "Yes; but, of course I may be mistaken."
- "No, you are not," muttered Watson to himself, the moment the other captain had departed. "The worst of it is, they used to know each other in New York, and I even suspect that, young as he is, they are engaged."

It may as well be stated that the captain's suspicion was correct.

Harry Wand—the son of a colonel, who had fought bravely in the war of 1813, had first been introduced to Mary Clare, when she was fourteen and he but seventeen, at the house of a mutual friend. The father of Mary, an old New York merchant, had looked favorably upon the intimacy between the young people, as Harry, though rather wild, was a promising youth, and would probably rise to distinction in the navy, where he had been 'breveted' midshipman at the age of thirteen.

Later his father had died nearly bankrupt, an institution in which he had invested large sums having failed.

Mr. Clare, however, who was a man of high principle and good sense, did not care for this, so long as Harry was industrious. The engagement therefore between the young sailor and his daughter remained the same, without any effort on the part of the father to break it.

In a year, Harry had said, he hoped to make Mary his wife. Having a proper degree of pride, he had declared that he would not marry until he was able to support the young girl without her father's assistance. He had permitted Mr. Clare to invest a little money left to him in stocks, which promised well. For the rest he trusted to his profession. "Promotion would come soon!" he said, with all the ardor of youthful hope—he believed in a short time he would be made second lieutenant aboard the Argus.

Disappointment! A senior midshipman, from another craft, was put in the place he had expected to fill.

No wonder this provoked him, and that to his Mary he often complained of the tardiness and stupidity of the Government.

She endeavored to comfort him, but somehow failed. He seemed to grow moodier every time she saw him—seemed thoughtful and absent, as if busy with mental planning.

Meanwhile, Captain Malo, the smuggler, had sought him, and, as shown, hinted at the rich profits of his lawless occupation, without yet exciting in his mind any suspicion that he was concerned in the lawless trade.

Matters were thus when the two cutters—the Roland and the Argus—arrived almost simultaneously at New Orleans.

Captain Watson, attired in his well-brushed uniform, did not fail to visit Clare, and endeavor to interest Mary.

The lonely girl tried to seem cheerful, although it was plain ber thoughts were occupied with another—with Harry Wand, who had hever before remained so long absent from her, after the arrival of his vessel in port.

Hours passed--the day went by-still he came not.

Her father went to the Argus and inquired concerning the young man.

The answer was that he had left the vessel at morning, and had not yet returned. Next day and the next—he was still absent.

Mary was nearly distracted. Harry had seemed moodier than ever, when they last parted. Was it possible that he had destroyed himself?

She dismissed the thought; then came the fear that others had injured him, that he had somewhere met with foul play.

It was a melancholy sight to see the color fade from Mary's check, the light from her eye.

She shunned society, shutting herself in ner chamber for hours at a time. Vainly her father endeavored to cheer her—vainly Captain Watson trimmed his whoseers, and put on his most lively manner. Mary's only comfort was the little miniature of Harry Wand, which she carried in her bosom, and which, when by herself, she would take out and kiss again and again.

The strange disappearance of Wand was, among naval men, a frequent theme of conversation. Young as he was, his merits as a sailor, and certain daring deeds he had performed, now and then, when occasion offered, had won for him a reputation.

Meanwhile Captain Watson exerted himself to please Mary. To say that she liked the man would be untrue, and yet he had certain traits which interested her. He was an excellent conversationist, had some some wit, and was fall of the and sparkle. Although he could not draw her mind from the one engrossing subject, nor bring back the color to the protty check, yet his magnetism was felt.

Her father, noticing the beneficial effect of his presence on the young girl, encouraged his visits, and was glad whenever he came.

Thus time went on until a year had passed.

Business kept Mr. Clare in New Orleans still, at the mansion he had hired. Meanwhile the smuggling system seeming to strengthen rather than dimenish, made trade very dull.

"Have you heard the news?" said Captain Watson, one day to Mary-his vessel being at this time in port.

The young girl was scated upon the veranc's of the marsion, which commanded a good view of the gu'f. Her small, white hand, fistlessly casped, rested upon her lap, her luxuri at black hair fell in heavy masses down her shoulders, forming a peculiar contrast to her clear complexion. Meanwhile the large brown eyes, turned seaward, were sad and thoughtful—the snowy brow now and then contracted into a slight frown, yet not enough to mar the superior loveliness of the face.

"No," she auswere !, half turning the lithe waist to look at the captana, who stood by her side.

"Well, the santgglers, hitherto a myth, have taken shape -have turned to timbers, blue jackets and sea-boots."

She half smiled, not wholly comprehending him.

"In a word, we Government cruisers have come across a suspicious craft—a low nulled clipper schooler, the Dolphin, which, from information obtained, contains a formidable crew of smugglers. We are all in chase of that craft, which, I can assure you, Miss Clare, is a wonderful sailer. From stem to stern she is painted Blue, so that, at a distance, her hull seems to mingle with sky and water! She has but lately appeared, and is a saucy craft to catch. She'll give us all a long chase."

"What are you doing here, then?" said Mary, a little mischievously. "I should think you would be after this won-derial BLUE CLIPPER also !"

"So I am. For that very reason I am now in port. When last seen, the BLUE CLIPPER was heading hitherward. I am watching for her, and hope I may be fortunate enough to make her crew also look blue."

The captain then departed.

Mary remained on the piazza. By and by up came the noon over the eastern scalourd, throwing a long flood or pathway of silver light across the water.

Some of this light, extending to the garden fronting the piazza, threw a soft, mellow luster over the shrubbery, full of fragrant blossoms and fruits. The garden contained an acre of ground, beautifully and tastefully ornamented with gravel paths, broad, narrow and winding, with marke statuary, fountains, and flowers. It was inclosed by a white fence, containing two gates—one opening upon a carrage-path and the other upon the main path for pedestrians.

Beyond, the land, covered with a carpet of Leautiful grass, soped downward to the edge of the sea, where it terminated in a white, sandy beach, fall of snowy pebbles.

Thinking of Harry Wand, Mary sat, far into the night, looking seaward. What had become of him? She recalled to mind his noble face and form, exactly as he looked when they last parted; the brow clouded, the eyes showing a singularly mixed expression of gloom and tenderness, every time he turned his gaze upon her. Then he had gone away, and—alas! was she destined never to see him again?

While occupied with such thoughts, she beheid something long and slender glide between her and the moon, far out at sea !

It was a sail.

This was no uncommon sight. She merely glanced at it, then retired to her apartment. Poor girl! Slumber seldom visited her long, now. She had not slept four hours when she waked. The gray light of dawn was just beginning to creep upon the sky in faint, red streaks. Her window commanded a view of the sea. She looked through it, then uttered a slight cry of surprise.

There, not more than half a league distant, was the very schooner Captain Watson had spoken to her about—a vessel printed blue from stem to stern—the BLUE CLIPPER !

Women admire daring. Many could not keep from smiling to herself at the courage of the schooner's captain, ventuing so near a Government cruiser; for the blue clipper was in reality merely screened by a high ridge of land to the right of the mansion, from Watson's vessel, and an American force lying not two leagues beyon i, by one of the city wharves!

Diesers herself, the young girl walked out on the piazza. The peculiar form of the schooner riveted her attention. The hull, while low, projected along the center, curving amidships, and tapering in a lengthy line toward the bows.

which were sharp and shaped exactly like a sword-fish, the boom resembling the weapon of the creature named.

While still watching the vessel, she heard a step. She looked up, to behold a tall, manly form by her side, the face rearly concealed by a straw hat, with a fluttering black ribbon round the crown. The rest of the attire consisted of a blue jacket, with the figure of a miniature silver cask worked upon each shoulder, white duck pants, confined round the waist by a blue sash, white stockings, and slippers of a bright blue color.

At sight of this apparition, the girl would have screamed had not the strange visitor raised the slouched straw hat.

Harry Wand stood before her!

CHAPTER III.

A STARTLING ACCUSATION.

For a moment Mary could not utter a word. Surprise and joy locked her speech.

The young man advanced another step, and she threw herself upon his bosom.

"Oh, Harry!" she murmured, the tears coursing down her cheeks. "Why have you staid away so long?"

"I could not help it. Duty kept me."

"And could you find no way to call on me-no way to send me word where you were, all this time?"

He colored. The same gloomy look she had noticed when they last parted, settled upon his face.

"I could not. But you had company. Captain Watson,

I dare say, has called frequently."

"And is it possible you are jealous?" sail Mary, in voice of reproach.

" You enjoyed his visits."

"Yes; as I would have erjoyed seeing a monkey. The captuin is something amusing."

Her eyes beamed tenderness upon him. Their expression soothed him, and his brow cleared.

- "Now tell me where you have been for so long a time?"
 He shook his head.
- "What did rou think of my coming so suddenly upon you?" he said, evasively.

"You certainly took me by surprise."

- "The balcony is easily reached by climbing one of the culptured pillars on the other side."
- "You took this way I suppose to startle and surprise me. It is like you."

Her hand rested upon his arm, the lovely face was turned up to him.

Suddenly a hearty voice was heard behind them.

"Hallon! why, what means this? Harry Wand, as I live!" and Mr. Clare appeared.

The young man colored and started, half in confusion.

Then he accepted the merchant's extended hand.

"Glad to see you—very glad, upon my word," said Mr. Clare. "Where the dence have you been to?"

"I-I-have been on duty," stammered the young man.

"In the name of a thousand wonders, what kind of duty?" inquired Clare, surveying the speaker's peculiar uniform. "What is the meaning of that cask, instead of an anchor, upon your collar?"

"You will excuse me, sir, if I decline answering that ques-

"Certainly. Had I know it was a secret I should not have asked."

Bang !- from the blue clipper, at that moment.

Mr. Clare starte I, and for the first time noticing the vessel, almost bounded off his feet.

Captain Watson had told him about this craft.

"What is the matter, sir?" Harry coolly inquired.

"The matter? And is it possible that you, a naval man, have not yet noticed yonder vessel? She is a notorious smuggler."

Wan I turned, and taking a small spy-glass from his pocket, leveled it at the vessel.

" A nice-looking craft," said he.

A illiesh and a puil of smoke from one of the schooner's porta. Another gun boomed over the sea.

"I must bid you good morning," said Wand "Before I go, I have a favor to ask, that you will consent to my union with your daughter, immediately."

"You are rather sudden, my dear sir," answered Mr. Clare,

"but I am sure, if Mary is willing-"

"Oh, papa!" interrupted the blushing girl, hiding her face upon his shoulder.

"That means yes, I suppose," said the merchant, smiling.
"Meanwhile, before we say further upon the subject, let us watch the movements of yonder saucy craft. Upon my word, her captain must be a bold fellow to venture so near cur government vessels. I do not believe they see her. I think I will go at once and inform; or rather you had better go, Harry, as you are younger and spryer."

"There is no need of my going," he answered "The blue clipper has already been sighted."

As he spoke, he pointed to the masts of Watson's revenue cutter, which were now seen appearing round a point of land to the left.

"A smart fellow, that Watson!" exclaimed Mr. Clare; "you never catch him asleep."

"Nor will he ever catch the clipper, sir," said Wand. "Good-day."

"Are you going in pursuit of her, too?" inquired Clare.
"Where is your vessel?"

"Her anchor is already apeak, sir," replied Frank. "She is not far from here."

He lifted his hat to Mary.

"I may come this evening, again," said he, "and perhaps not for two or three days."

Mary accompanied him to the door.

He snatched a hasty kiss, and she watched him as he disappeared swiftly over the elevation to the right of the house.

Then she joined her father on the piazza.

Their gaze was turned toward the blue clipper, which, in one minute, had spread her mainsail, while both her foresail and foretopsail were quickly sheeted home.

Swinging round to the north-east, she soon vanished behind the ridge. Meanwhile there was Watson's cutter, gallantly tossing the white water in chase.

When opposite the mansion, a square-built form was seen on he quarter-deck, bowing to Mary and her father.

It was the captain.

In a few minutes this craft was also hidden by the ridge.

A quarter of an hour elapsed ere the blue clipper again hove in sight, speeding like an arrow on a south-east course, with the wind now upon her quarter.

She was full a league from the ridge, ere Watson's cutter was again seen. Both vessels now had all their canvas set but it was plain that the cutter was no match for the craft, which soon disappeared far away in a blue mist oceanward, leaving the cutter many miles astern. Mary and her father watched the vessels until they were out of sight ere leaving the piazza.

"I saw nothing of Wand's vessel," said Mr. Clare; "it is very strange, unless, indeed, he went in some other direction to head that blue rascal off."

The night which followed was quite dark.

It was about ten o'clock when the door-bell rung.

A minute later, Wand, enveloped in a cloak, and attired in a gray suit of citizen's clothing, was ushered into the drawing-room, where sat Mary and her father, talking over the late event.

With a glad cry, and blushing deeply, the young girl rose to welcome her lover.

- "Without further prelude," said Wand, when he had returned the salutation of the two, "I have come for my bride."
- "Are you out of your senses, Harry?" said Mr. Clare; "it is ten o'clock at night."
 - "I know it."
 - "And you would marry my daughter to-night?"
 - "Ay, sir; the sooner the better," replied he.
 - "What say you to this, Mary?" said Mr. Clare, laughing.
- "Well, really," said Mary, blushing, "I think Mr. Wand is rather hasty. I—in fact—I have made no preparations."
- "Ay, ay," answered Wand, "I understand that. You chall know the cause of my seeming in such an unreasonable hurry, after the event. Your friend, the Rev. Robert Waldron," he added, addressing Mr. Clure, "can perform the ceremony at once. We can take a carriage and go there, no mediately."

"At least wait until to-morrow," said Mr. Clare.

"Nay," said Mary, blushing like a rose, "I dare say Harry has good reasons, and if-"

"Tell your reasons now, young man," said the merchant,

"and I will no longer refuse."

" Begging your pardon, sir, I can not do that, now."

At that moment the door-bell again rung.

Hasty steps were soon heard coming up the stairs. In another minute, Watson, accompanied by his lieutenant and a midshipman, entered the apartment.

Wand stepped back a couple of paces, eying the newcomers, keenly.

" You are my prisoner!" said the captain, advancing.

Wand drew a revolver.

"What means this?" cried Mr. Clare, while Mary, with a shrick, rushed to her lover's side.

"It means that in the person of Harry Wand, you see the captain of the blue clipper!" replied Watson.

CHAPTER IV.

THE BLUE CLIPPER.

When Wand left Mary and her father, after his conversation with them on the piazza, he had repaired to the beach on the other side of the ridge of land, running parallel with the sea. There a small boat, containing six men, aw itel him. The men were sturdy-looking fellows, attired in Greensey frocks, with blue cloth cops upon their heads. Hound their waists were belts, containing knives rather too long for the "innocent" sheath-knives usually worn by sailors. In a word, they were eyldently intended for other work than the cutting of rigging and rope-yarns.

"Give way, lads," cried Wand, springing lightly into the stern-sheets; " lively, my good fellows."

The men bending to their oars, made the boat fly.

Soon it was alongside the clipper, which had come bowling ound the ridge of land where it projected into the sea.

Wand was soon aboard, and his boat hoisted.

"In good time, captain," said his first officer, advancing the cutter is after us."

Wand soon had his vessel booming seaward.

"Call all hands," said he. "They must be ready, as there is no knowing what might happen."

"True. If we should happen to lose a spar, the cutter would overhaul us, in which case?"—looking inquiringly at the captain.

"We would have to fight to the death, sir," said Wand, showing his teeth.

All hands came on deck. There were a hundred fine stalwart fellows, a few Portuguese and Spaniards among them, but most of them Americans.

"Men," sail Wand, "the hounds are after us. I do not think they will overhaul us, but, if they should, we must fight!"

"Ay, ay, hooray, hooray!" cheered the band—a hundred knives flashing in air.

"Remember our motto is to either conquer or go down with the blue clipper?"

The handsome face of the speaker wore a resolute expression, showing that he meant what he said.

"Ay, conquer or sink!" growled a Cape Cod man among the crew; "that's the word!"

Again the cheers of the men went rolling through the sea must.

They gathered round their young captain, their knives clashing as they crossed them.

He exerted over them a strange influence—the influence of a min or strong character. They love I him, and would have gone through the and water to serve him.

While a strict disciplinarian, he was ever kind and considerate, and would never resert to violent measures in controlling his men unless actually compelled to do so.

Fore and aft he kept his little schooner in the neatest trim, every rope being coiled in its place, and the decks holy-stoned to a virgin white. Even the jack-stays on the yards, to say nothing of the ringbolts below, which were polished to shine like silver, were so clean that they fairly glistened.

Having dismissed his men, Wand now had cloud upon cloud of canvas piled upon the schooner, which tore through the waters like an arrow, scattering, in showers, the silver spray about her bows.

Soon the cutter was lost sight of, far astern.

Wand then tacked, standing north-west. He enjoined silence throughout the vessel, as it was his intention to best up to New Orleans, and he might pass the cutter on his way.

There was a thick mist now upon the water. The young captain, therefore, had careful look-outs posted in the bows and in the foretop.

In about an hour, the creaking of yards and blocks was heard, right ahead.

"Keep off!" whispered Wand to the helmsman—" carefully, my man—there, that's it!"—as the vessei fell off a couple of points.

The captain then ran forward, jumping upon the bow.

All was as still as death, abourd the schooner, the dusky crew standing as motionless as statues, by tacks and braces, ready to obey the slightest command.

Suddenly Wand started as if he was shot. Right ahead of him, he beheld the tall masts and huge black hull of an American frigate!

Immediately, however, he recovered his self-possession, for, while, from her enormous hight, the frigate was to him plainly visible, it was evident that the schooner, owing to her blue color and smaller size, could not be distinctly seen from the war-vessel.

Springing to the helm, he kept the schooner of an ther point, so that he would pass diagonally away from the frients, and yet not enough so to excite the size icions of these about h

" Alloy, there! what vessel's that?' came in a rough hall from the larger craft.

"The Rolland, United States cutter," answered Wand, through his trumpet.

" Heave to, if you please; will send a boat aboard !"

" Ay, ay !"

Tom Bend, the Cape God man, aboard the schooner, stood by the fore-sheet, grinning from ear to ear. He was a queer-looking fellow, with great joints all over his frame protruding beneath his clothing, and with a swarthy face, the chin of which looked sharp enough to split a pine board.

"Ay, ay, it is!" muttered the fellow to himself, protruding his chin across the lee rail; "guess them chaps will git 'ay, ay!" afore they board this craft."

Lest then another sound, ominous to all hands, was heard night to leeward.

It was the roaring made by the bows of another vessel coming straight for the schooner!

Wand was out upon the jib-boom, and beheld the outlines of the cutter looming up through the mist!

He was, as it were, between two fires—the cutter on one side of him, coming up, and the frigate on the other.

In this dilemma the nicest scamanship was required.

"Luff a little!" was his quiet order to the man at the helm.

The schooner was now running along on a straight line, right between the two vessels.

"Alwy, there!" came from the frigate; "why don't you back your main yard?"

Wand not answering, the suspicions of the frigate's comman by were evidently excited, although, owing to the thic mist and the change in the schooner's course, she was now invisible to him.

There was a flash and a puff of smoke, then the crash of a gun followed by a crash to beward.

The cutter's jib-boom had been carried away by the shot meant for the schooner.

At this Tom Bend, the Cape Cod man, thrusting both hands in his peckets, and silently laughing, leaned so far back that his sharp chin pointed up to the north star.

Monwhile on went the schooner, tearing up the water with her long, sword-fish bow.

"Now, then, keep off!" said Wand to the helmsman.

He was obeyed, and in a few minutes the schooner had left her two enemies a tern, the wrangling voices of their comman lers ringing upon the ears of her crew.

The captuin kept straight on for New Orleans.

"Beg your pardon, sir, but won't they be after us now?"
suggested his lieutenant.

"I don't think so!"

"I would suggest an excellent trick, sir; that we now keep off a short distance, then stand along upon the course the frigate was pursuing, while in chase of us. Her commander will not suspect this. He will naturally suppose that we are running from him on our present course."

"There you are mistaken, sir!" answered Wand. "Both the frigate's and the cutter's captains will at once conclude that we attempted the very ruse you suggest, and will stand along for some time in that direction. Therefore, to keep on as we are is the best plan."

As the wind was dead ahead, it was dark before the schooner ran abreast of the ridge to the right of Clare's mansion.

For a couple of hours she lay off and on, with good lockouts posted, to make sure the coast was clear.

Owing to the darkness, Wand did not see Watson's vessel, stealing into the harbor with all her lights concend !.

In a word, the latter, after explanations had ensued between him and the frigate's commander, had stood along for an hour, as he supposed, in the wake of the schooner. As his vessel needed repairing, after her late injuries, he then vecred ship and ran for New Orleans. Thinking, meanwhile, that the schooner might also be standing upon the same course, he took the precaution to show no lantern as he ran into the harber.

The moment the vessel's anchor was dropped, he lewered a boat, and pulled along the coast to see if there was any sign of the fugitive.

He had not gone far, when he beheld the obtlines of the vessel, looming through the gloom, and saw a lost love her and steal along in the direction of the landing back of Mr. Clare's mansion.

He had his own boat directed beneath the shadow of a rock, whence he could, unobserved, see the other.

It is hardly necessary to add that Wan I was in the watched boat, on his way to visit Mary. His crew consisted of four men, Tom Bend among the number.

The Cope Cod man pulled an excellent oar; so vigorous, in fact, were his strokes that he was obliged to slacken, now and then, so as not to "pull his shipmates round." Through the darkness the light blue eyes of this man, gleaming like the ringed orbs of a wild-cat, were ever turned toward the face of the young captain, whom he seemed to watch with singular intentness.

When the boat struck the beach, Wand left his four men in charge of it, telling his boatswain to sound his whistle in case of a surprise.

The moment the captain was gone, Tom Bend solicited permission to go on what he called a "reconsidering" expedition along the coast. The boatswain consented, ordering him, however, to be back in half an hour.

Bend promising obedience departed. He moved along through the darkness some distance without seeing any thing to excite his suspicions—Watson and his men having just landed alone the other boat, which they had passed with muffled oars too far off to be discovered.

Bend then changed his "course," stealing along toward the mansion, which Wand had entered a quarter of an hour before.

CHAPTER V.

TRACKING.

"YES," repeated Watson, as Mary Clare and her father looked aghast at each other, on hearing his dreadful announcement, "Henry Wand is the captain of the blue clipper; let him deny it if he can!"

M anwhile the speaker and his companions had drawn their ewords.

"Pack!" excluimed Wand, bracing himself against the wall, "the first who attempts to molest me falls!"

"Hel!, Mr. Wan!!" exclaimed Clare; "if this accusation be true, you had better surrender, at once!"

Mery, with a low cry, threw herself between her lover and the officers, a hand upon each shoulder of the young man. Mr. Clare drew her away. - . .

"Nay, my child," he exclaimed, "Wand does not deny the accusation. He has forfeited all claim to your hand by the horrible treachery he has practiced. Surely you would not wish to continue on terms with such a person."

"Hold, papa! there must be some mistake! I conjure you!" she added to the officers, "to leave him, at present. He will probably explain, afterwards."

"My dear young lady," said Watson, bowing, "my duty compels me to arrest him. There can be no mistake. He left the blue clipper, which now lies off and on the ridge to the right of this house."

The speaker had not concluded when Wan I, springing to the open sash of the window, overlooking the balcony, durted out.

Watson and his companions darted after him, evertaking him just as he was on the point of descending by means of one of the pillars. Ere they could seize him, he struck the captain a violent blow on the head with the butt of his revolver, and hurled his lieutenent, as he made a blow at him with his sword, to one side.

The other officer, who had lifted his curlass, was about dealing the fugitive a blow from which he would have never recovered, when suddenly a sinewy figure, which had mounted to the balcony by one of the pillars at the other end of it, came rushing to the spot.

"Jist in time, blast 'em!" exclaimed this worthy, who was none other than Tem Bend; "Low d'ye like my chin?"

As he spoke he ran his sharp chin against the head of the officer, with the force of a battering-ram, pushing against him at the same time, and sending him headlong acres the rail of the balcony to the grown? below—a distance of twenty for.

By this time the first lieutenant, who had been hurled aside by Wand, was ready to renew the combat.

His sword describing a circle through the air, must have nearly taken off Bend's head, but for his captain, who, still, for some reason or other, not seeming to with to discharge his pistol, struck the officer on the head with the butt of it, thus laying him senseless by the side of the half-stunned Watson, who had not yet regulated his feet

Now, however, up he sprung, dashing at Ward so suddenly that the young man was taken unawares.

In fact, the captain's sword must have passed through his boly, but for the prompt action of Bend.

"So you want some chin, too, do ye?" exclaimed the Cape Cod man, and drove the pointed member straight into Watson's eye.

The captain starrered, and as he did so, was knocked serve-les by a blow from E. r. I's flat.

Qui k as a will-eat, the sailor then descended the balcony Fillar to the ground, where he was joined by Wand.

"Exercise, sir," said the Cape Cod man, saluting his common br, " for soing the t; but the fact is, do you see, I was afraid you would stop to tell me to go before you, in which the I should sarrinly have insisted on your goin', and then we'd have lost time."

"I's all might, Bend; no excuses; you've done well."

"Which was all owin' to the chin, sir," said Bend, as the twain dar'd af toward the spot where they had left the boat.

Thinking that the men in charge of it might have been attached, Wand approached the spot cautiously. He found the teen and the boat in their places.

We'con had probably wished to delay the attack in this curver, until he should have succeeded in capturing the captain.

"Give way!" cried Wand, as he sprung into the boat.

Tie occupants were soon aloard the schooner, which a moment later went bowling seaward.

"It is all over," muttered the young captain, as he descent all into the calin and bowed his face upon his hands. "What I forced has happened, and she will probably be personical to marry Watson."

Occasion d'y, in great agitation, he would rise and pace the cabin, hurriedly.

"Ay," he muttered, "I may no longer hope to win Mary Clare. She, herse'd, even if she had no father to persuade her, would not probably marry a smuggler."

He went on deck, and there continued pacing to and fro.

All that night and the next day the schooner was headed couth-west. In the afternoon a sail was sighted ahead.

It proved to be a small brig, bound south. Wand hailed her, to be informed that the brig was the Petrel, from New Orleans. He invited the captain aboar l.

"No, thank you," answered the latter, his eyes twinkling

"I have heard of you, and would not care to associate."

The Cape Cod man, leaning across the scheener's rail grinned as he glanced at the brig's quarter.

Then he glided aft.

" Beg pardon, capt'in, but that ere chap is no saint."

"What do you mean?"

" An honest craft, generally, ain't got Two NAMES-I'll bet my chin on that."

As he spoke, he looked straight at the brig's quarter, upon which, protruding just above the name Petrel, were the edges of the other letters, showing that the skipper was in the habit of sailing under two names.

"Ahoy, there," shouted Wand, "who christene ! your cr.f. ?'

"Ay, ay, who christianed her?" repeated Tom Bend, thrusting his chin over the rail, so that it pointed straight at the captain of the brig.

The skipper colored, glanced over his quarter; then langled and winked.

"We understand each other," he shouted to Wand. "Success to the blue clipper."

He lowered a boat, and coming aboard, he and the other were soon in earnest conversation.

"Why were you reluctant to let me know your character?"

inquired the young man.

"It's my rule," answered the other, "never when I can help it, to let even those in my trade know what I am. It prevents notoriety. I marvel that you, who are also in our line, should have made yourself so conspectors. Your the capper will be the mark for all the sharks in the navy."

Wand smiled.

plied, his eyes flashing during. "Besides, the little Derruis, which, if you look closely at my clipper's stern, you will see in the name painted thereon in white colors, can cutsuit all their smaller crafts. As to the frigates, I have to maneaver when they are after me."

- " You have not yet been admitted to our league ?"
- " No."
- "It is an excellent thing. Your profits would be greatly increased by joining it. But you have not been long in the business yet."

" Not quite a year."

" Two years is the rule, as I suppose you know?"

on my own account for two years, ere I could be admitted to the League of the Silver Cask, which, I believe, is the name it goes by ?"

"Yes, Malo is at the head. A smart man, and a cunning one, too. His rendezvous is where one would least suspect. Were it discovered, and the smuggler's ledger-book, which is there, and obtained by the 'sharks,' there would be an end of our work, as they contain the names of all the members of the League, with their different hiding-places."

" So I have heard. You know where this rendezvous is?"

- "Ay, ay; but I would die sooner than reveal it to one who was not a member of the League."
- "You perceive that I am a candidate for it," said Wand, procuring his jacket from the rail, upon which it hung inside the companion-way, and showing the silver cask worked upon the shoulder.
 - "Ay ay. I hope to see you a member at the right time."

" Thank you."

The two captains now separated. A minute after the two vessels were pursuing nearly opposite courses.

Wand kept on until only the brig's mosts could be seen above the sea, when he sublenly veered round.

"Do you see that fellow's spars?" he said, to the helmsman.

" Ay, ay, sir."

" Well, keep the schooner on a bee-line for them."

"Ay, ay, sir."

He then conversed in a low voice with his first officer, after which he went below.

The crew wondered why he should follow the brig.

"It's all plain enough, don't ye see?" exclaimed Tom Bend, he's af ail that brig's captain is a double-faced chap, and will tell tales on us."

The schooner was kept after the brir, until night hill her masts from sight. Then Wan I charged on sall, thatil he was near enough to distinguish her light, keeping his own, meanwhile, concealed. He then shortened sail again so as to hold his present distance from the vessel he was following.

Thus he continued on until near dawn, when he allowed imself to fall so far astern, that, owing to the blue coll refais vessel, and a light mist prevailing, the schooner could not have been seen from the brig.

Before night the latter vessel was observed to anchor off that part of the coast about sixty miles from Vera Cruz.

Wand now laid off and on, still keeping out of sight of the other craft.

At dark he had his boat lowered, and pulled ashere, about four miles from the spot where the brig was anchored.

Taking with him a couple of trusty men, Tem Bendons of the number, armed with revolver and cutless, he moved swiftly along the shore, until he had gained a rock opposite the spot where the brig lay anchored, and behind which he screened himself and his men.

A few minutes after a boat was lowered from the brig, containing the captain and one man.

It was seen by the light of the moon shining at the time, to glide toward the line of conical rocks, which have been mentioned, and among which it soon a ter disagrence!

"We must follow those fellows," said Wand to Tom Bend, to do which we'll have to wade and swim in search of them."

"Ay, ay, sir!" answered Bend. "I can swim like a codfish. My chin will sarve a good turn if we git catangled in sourced. I can cut that in two with it, and clear the way."

Having ordered the other man to remain, and giving him a whit is to sound as an alarm in case of his sering any party approaching. Wand now divesting himself of his sines and jacket, entered the water with his conquation.

"Which way, sir?" in quired Bend, as each of the men tied his cuthass and his revolver to his back, to prevent their getting wet.

" Straight ahead."

falently and swiftly the two then swam in the required direction, which took them to the base of one of the conical peaks.

"Look sharp, Bend," whispered Wand; "d'ye see any thing?"

The man answered in the negative. Suddenly the light dip of paddles was heard.

"There they are," whispered Bend, pointing at the boat, which had left the brig, and was now seen slowly pursuing its way among the rocky labyrinths.

Finally it was seen to strike the base of one of the peaks,

Which its occupants now commenced ascending.

"Now, then," said Wand, the moment the brig's men were screened by a projecting rock, "now is our time. We must follow them."

Both struck out, and swimming and wading a distance of twenty yards, had nearly reached the base of the cliff, when, as they moved toward the beach, their legs were suddenly caught in what seemed to be a network of ropes cunningly laid under water!

While vainly endeavoring to extricate themselves, they heard the whistle of the man they had left behind them sounding an alarm!

CHAPTER VI

THE LOST GIRL.

The scene upon the balcony of Clare's mansion between Wan!, Tom Bend and the officers of the Roland had been partially witnessed by Mr. Clare and his daughter, the light from the room after ling them an in listinct view.

Mr. Clare had held on flimly to his daughter, who still showed the atmost anxiety on her lover's account, and scemed anxies to interfere to prevent his being hurt.

Finally Captain Watson, recovering from the effects of the blows he had received, opened his eyes to see Mr. Clare bending over him. Mary was nowhere in sight; she had gone to her room, there to indulge alone the new sorrow which had come upon her.

"Have they escaped?" cried Watson, springing to his feet.

Mr. Clare said he believed they had, at which Watson, grinding his teeth, said he would yet be even with "that rescal."

"Unfortunately," he added, "my vessel needs repairing, so that I can not go. at once."

Mr. Clare seemed to consider a moment.

"I have an idea," said he, "that sea-air would do Mary good—would distract her from her thoughts of that young smuggler. Will you take us aboard as your passengers, during the chase?"

"Most willingly," answered the delighted captain. "Mean-while, may I ask you to trouble yourself for some kind of plaster? There was a sort of wild barbarian Sampson with that fellow who nearly bunged out my eye with an ass' jawbone!"

The plaster having been procured for his eye, the captain departed.

A week later his vessel was bowling out of the harbor, bearing aboard both Mary Clare and her father. It was only the fact that Watson was about starting in pursuit of her lover's vessel that had induced the young girl to comply with her parent's request to take passage aboard his enemy's craft. With the feverish anxiety a woman feels for a beloved object. Mary longed to be near Wand throughout his troubles.

While shocked and grieved at the strange course he had taken, she had again and again endeavored to find excuses for him. Could she but see him alone for a couple of hours, she doubted not that she could persuade him to give up the lawless life he had chosen.

When she said this to Mr. Clare, however, he shreezed his shoulders, and saily answered that Wand could be hung, if arrested, for thus proving a traiter to the Government.

Mary's check again lost its color; her eyes looked very sad, and ever seemed, now, to bear the traces of weepsat.

Vainly Watson endeavored to some ner-to assure herjoking about his bunged eve and other matters. The girl would stand, day after day, looking far away toward the clouds upon the distant horizon, and wondering if Wand's vessel was among them—wondering what her lover was now doing, and, above all, hoping that he would not be captured.

The vessel steering south-west had kept on for three days without a sign of the blue clipper being seen, when, on the evening of the fourth day, a number of lights, like lanterns, were observed, moving hither and thither through the long trass ashore, growing near the beach, about two miles above Vera Cruz.

Watson did not seem to particularly notice the lights; but

Mr. Clare had watched them narrowly from the first.

"They are nothing but will-o'-the-wisps," answered the captain, to a query from the merchant; "we may as well keep along on our course."

"I tuink you are mistaken," replied Clare; "I am sure I see the frint outlines of human figures."

"Do you? Oh, well, I shouldn't be surprised if they are Indian fishermen."

The old gentleman went below, procuring his night-glass, after looking through which he exclaimed:

"There are casks; I see casks ashore, there, in the long grass; and there, also, near the beach, is a large boat like a flat-boat. Captain, those men are smugglers."

Now Watson seemed to show considerable interest. The night-glass revealed to him also the casks and the boat.

"Back the main yard and clear away my quarter-boat," he ordered.

He was obeyen; the boat was lowered and manned by men armed with cutlasses and pistols. The cutter's lights were then extinguished.

Mr. Clare requested permission to go with the captain. The latter lesit ted at first; but Clare almost insisting, he was permitted to go.

"I must go, too -oh, papa!" said a sad voice; and looking up, the boat's crew beheld Mary at the rail.

"As there may be a combat," said Watson, in a low voice, to Mr. Clare, "your child had better remain where she is."

So Clare thus urged; but she was resolute. Feeling almost sure that her lover was involved with those smugglers shore, she was anxious to go, and insisted upon it.

Masculine gallantry would not permit the seaman to hold out longer. A comfortable seat was made for Mary, and more men ordered into the boat to act as a guard and take care of her, in case of an affray.

With muffled ours the craft was then directed shoreward.

As she drew near the beach, the forms, and even the faces of the men ashore were faintly seen by the light of their leaterns.

Some of them were attired in dark pants, jackets and some westers; others were Guernsey frocks, and Lad heavy seabouts reaching above their linees.

In the stern-sheets watching them, Watson suddenly was attacked with a violent fit of coughing.

"Confound it," he exclaimed, "the fellows will hear me!" They did hear him. More than one man carrying a lantern was seen hurrying toward the beach. The sounds of voices, with the noise made by the rolling of casks, su ldenly stopped. The lanterns were also extinguished; a dark line, as of the outlines of men gathering to resist an attack, was seen along the beach.

"There are many of them, as nearly as I can judge," said Watson; "we had better return abound for more hands."

"I am surprised to hear you, sir," remarked Clare; "don't you see that the rascals will escape?"

"Ay, true enough. We will go ashore," and he was again seized with that violent fit of coughing.

Just then there was a wild, flerce shout; the crack of firearms was heard, several bullets passed over the heads of the crew.

" Pull, men, pull lively!" screamed Watson.

"The Loat is sinking," said his coxswain. "Some of the buildes have ripped her planking."

"That can not be."

As the captain spoke, Mr. Care detected something which surprised him; a pair of arms, misch up from the water right in front of his face, which was turned sideways.

The he could speak, he was seized by the count and dragged over into the sea.

Over went the boat, at the same moment; the struggling crew finding themselves surrounded by about fifty stalwart wimmers, who at once made an attack upon them with heavy striking them on the head with one hand, while with the other supporting themselves upon the water. In a word, it was evident that these men had stoven and overturned the boat, thus at once depriving their adversaries of the power of using the firearms they had brought with them.

Several of the unfortunates, unable to swim, went down with gargling cries; the rest, vainly enceavoring to wield their curlasses, were either beaten senseless on the head, suffering the tate of their drowned companions, or, swimming away, were, with herce growls, pursued by their foes.

Nearly balf of the crew of thirty men were lost; the remspot where the smugglers had been seen.

As to Watson, a large fellow had lifted a club to beat out his brains, when the captain said something to him in a low voice.

Captive to the beach.

Meanwhile, what has become of Mary Clare and her father?

When the beat was overturned, the girl's shrick had been Learl ringing out an instant.

As to Mr. Clare, beaten nearly senseless, he had contrived, by swimming under water, to clude his assailant in the dark-ness. Selving an ear, he pushed it further out to sea, and cold, shivering, this of fears on his child's account, he clang to it until at length he was picked up by a boat which the limiter ant, suspecting foul play, had sent out, the crew provided with plenty of lanterns and well armed.

The best having picked up Mr. Clare, was directed ashore, the the captain was found lying, apparently much hurt.

To the inquiries of the load's officer, he replied that he late on dragged ashore and budly beaten, but not seriously, he would the smuggler having harriedly made off, fearing that the currer's people would take the alarm, and come pouncing upon them.

"I then't see how they knew the cutter was near," said

"They are sharp. I doubt not that while we were standing along, some fellow was out in a skiff spying upon us. The rascals swim like fish, and have made bad work with my men! How many have you picked up?"

"Not one as yet; but here is Mr. Clare,"-stating how he found him.

"Have you seen any thing of my daughter?" Clare anxiously inquired.

" No, sir. Good God, has she not yet been found?"

'No," groaned Clare, "my poor child must have been drowned."

"She may have been brought ashore," suggested the lieutenant; "let us examine the ground. It is soft, and we may discover her tracks."

A keen search was instituted, but no sign of the girl could be found. Mr. Clare's heart sunk within him. He now felt almost sure she had been drowned.

"I did not want her to go," said Watson. "I feared barm would befall her."

Poor Clare did not answer. He had snatched a lintern, and was running hither and thither, searching valuly for his lost child.

Among the casks scattered in profasion on every hand, he continued his search, until Watson came limping to his side.

"Little use, I'm afrail, looking for her, Lere, sir. We will take to the boat, and see if—if—"

"I understand," groaned Clare-" if we can fed her bedy."

He entered the boat, which was pulled vairly in all direction.

"How about those casks?" inquired his lieutenant, when they were abound, and Clare had gone below to include his deep grief in solitude.

"Casks? Oh!" said Watson. "I had not thought of them.
I was so worried about Miss Clare! Pray do not bring up ouch a subject at such a time."

"I feel as badly as you, sir, I dare say; but our calling requires-"

"Oh, never mind. We will think about the casks in the morning."

At dawn, that portion of the overturned boat's crew, who had escaped to the rock, were there seen from the cutter.

It was also noticed that not a cask was remaining! Both these and the flat-boat, which had been lying near the beach, had vanished.

"Well, I wouldn't have believed it!" cried Watson; "those chars must have come back, after we were gone, and have carriel off kieir casks, in the dark."

The men on the rock were picked up. They averred that they had indistinctly seen the flat-boat go by, loaded with its freight of casks during the night.

No signs yet of missing Mary Clare!

CHAPTER VII.

PRISONERS.

WAND and his companion struggled until they were out of breath to free themselves from the entangling under-water net.

Meanwhile the whistle continued sounding.

Suddenly it stopped.

Then followed the rapid strokes of oars, and, glancing behird, the two beheld a large boat, full of men, pulling toward them

"My chin can do no good ag'in' such overpowerin' number, !' remarked Tom Bend, smoothing the member, as if trying to make it yet sharper, with his hand.

"We might, perhaps, free ourselves from these coils with a knife," said Wand.

"Ay, but d've see, sir, the man that dove under water to do that would be like to git his head entangled, which would be worse than the feet."

"True; however, I am determined to try it."

So saying he pulled his knife from his belt and ducked his head under.

"I'm determined to follow suit, bet my chin on that!"

Down he went,

Meanwhile Wand began cutting the network. Unfortunately he got his arm entangled, so that he could no longer use the knife. While endeavoring to extricate the arm, his other one also became entangled. He was now unable to lik his head out of water to breather.

He felt bimself suffication - bis situation was forf !!

Su'denly something dark of we the waters before him. He lifted his heal, as his arms were fixed, out of the water, to see his companion's face covered with the network.

He soon freed him from his uncomfortable situation, to learn that he owed his preservation to Tom Bend, who, with his chin, had hooked the network, first hauling thus upon it, and then severing it with his knife.

Meanwhile the boat had now approached within twenty fathoms of the two men.

"They sartinly haven't seen us, yet," said Ben', as he turned his head far down, si leways.

"Why do you do that?"

Bend pointed to a long-peaked shalow, pr jecting upon the water.

"I'm tryin' to hide my chin, which, and readly, throws a long shaddy," answered Bend.

"This vey," said Wand, crawling out of the water.

Bend fellowed. The young man screenel himself belied a projecting spur of rock. They had been sufficiently in shadow not to be yet noticed.

On came the boat. It struck the very rock up which the two men had clambered. Lanterns were then lighted, revealing the dark faces of about thirty struct somen, attired in Guernsey frocks, blue pants and Scotch caps and somwesters.

"Now, hads!" said the leader, whem Wand recognized as Captain Malo, "follow me. We've made a good croise, and will to our cave to celebrate it with a few hampers!"

The remark was greeted with applicae.

"I dure say yonder fellow," possibly towerd the trip, "brings good news to us, also. I know her by the expored lights; she is the Petrel."

In single file the men now procested to no untitle cliff.

Wand, whispering Bend to follow, emerged from his hillest place, and moved after them.

Unfortunately, the Cape Cod man, impelied by curiosity thrust his neck a little too far above the wall of rock behind which they were creeping.

One of the party at that moment turned round. Bend do be located sight, but the man had, or funcied he had, seen some body, as wes evideed by his momen. He had halted, and stood looking in the direction of the rocky wall.

"Bul!" mattered Wand. "We can not make an assault upon the fe low for fear of alarming the others. Here he comes." Bend, at this time, was about ten feet from his captain, in a hollow of the rocks, and near the side of the cliff, which, at this point, was perpendicular and dangerous.

The young captain, who was watching him, saw him sud-donly fell, or parent'y he ulling from his position!

A moment liver, along came the man, peering into the hollow, when, not seeing any person—Wand being screened behind a rock—he rejoined his companions, evidently believing that his imagination had deceived him.

Anxions on Bend's recount, Wand now crawled to the edge of the cliff and peered down.

For some moments he could see nothing but the masses of thick vines, swaying against the rocky side.

Sillenly, however, thrust out from the thick mass, a foot below him, the young man beheld the face of Bend.

"A cute trick, sir. I jist flopped myself head over heels, swinzin' by one of these ere vines, into the shrubberum."

"Well done, Bend," whispered Wand; "but come, let us lose time. Those fellows are already twenty yards above us."

Ben I soon clambered to Lis captain's side.

In a minute the two men were close upon them, still, how-

The and is had now reached the opening in the top of tion of I, the men which they dose nded, one by one.

In the state the minutes after the last man had vanided, Waller pt forward and prefet into the opening. All was dealers, by thresting down a hand, he dis overed that the rope was still left hearing.

"I'l. go first," he wirispered to Benl; "you had, perhaps, better remain here.

"Bog parlin, sir; but I differ. I may be of sarvice, if I

"Very well. Follow me, then."

So saying, he swung himself into the opening, by means of the rope, and cautiously descending, when he was suldenly startled by a hourse voice below, halling him in Spanish, which he understood.

"Alloy, there, who's that?"

For an instant Wand remained motionless, har lly knowing what reply to make. To gain time, he answered, disguising his voice:

" It is I/"

" Captain Wilkins?"

"Ay, ay-and who are you?"

"Captain Malo's mate, Boker."

"Won't you go an I tell the captain to come here?"

The sound of receding footsters was heard below.

"Now, Bend, quick as lightning," whispered Wand; "down we go."

Down he went, followed by Bend. They groped along, side by side. Sublenly the rays of a lantern, in the distance, coming from the direction of the descending passage-way, were seen, partially lighting the gloom, revealing to the two men several rocky recesses.

Into one of these dirted the young equain, his compenion keeping at his side. So on all against Captain Malo, holding a large lantern. He gland that round him, after scrutinizing the rope.

"Very strange," he muttered. "what can have become of him."

He was about going back to his nate, to ascert in the menning of this strange affair, when Wand emerged from the recess.

Majo, holding up the lautern, receptized Lim.

"Hallo! hallo! What means this? How came you here?"

"I came by that rope," answere I Wand, coolly.

"Which here's Lopin' it may never be twisted round your neck," said Tom Bond, address or Main.

"Who's this fellow?" said Maio, stowling.

"He won't hart year. One of my men."

" How, in the name of periltien, did you find my renderwous, and how came you to be mistaken r Captain Wilkins —an old friend of mine."

"To your first question I answer, I followed you and your party—to the last, I suppose it was the darkness."

"And why did you follow me?" said Malo, fiercely; "who gave you permission?"

"I am anxious to become a member of the League of the Silver Cask," said Wand; "that was my reason. I know I have not been in the business two years, but I think you will a lmit me, when I tell you that, the moment you do, I will reward you with the services of my blue clipper."

Malo seemed to reflect.

"And this fellow," said the smurgler captain, surveying Bend, "I don't exactly like his looks."

"How d'ye like my chi !" inquired the Cane Cod man, thrusting the member alm st into the other's eyes.

"'Don't like it, at all. It's a reg'lar Yankee chin--sharp and inquisitive."

"You'll find it'll do you good sarvice," said Bend.

Malo now drew Wand aside.

The two conversed in a low voice for several moments, the smurgler chief consenting to take Wand and his companion into his League.

They were conducted into the main apartment, containing the whole band.

"This way," said Malo, as the rough fellows started up glaring like wild beasts at the twain. "Here, my men, are two more members for our League."

The band, drawing their cutlasses, gathered round the new comers.

From a desk in one corner, Malo then produced a ledge: book, the cover of which was painted red.

The two men were ordered to put their names down be neath a long list of others.

Wand wrote his with a steady hand. Bend drew back stroking his chin.

"Your turn !" said Malo.

"Am parfectly unacquainted with pens," answered the Cape Cod man.

He was then told to make a cross. Even this task he performed awkwardly; the cross looking like two pot-hooks falling against each other.

"You have witnessed," sail Malo, to his band.

"Ay, ay," was answered.

" What is the cost of treason?"

"The traiter to be starved to death and his body threen to the fishes!"

"Ay, ay, now!" cried Bend, "don't talk about st rvia' to death, but jist give us some smuggled rum and bliblis, as we're both blasted hungry."

"Silence!" roared Malo. "Now, men, prove the new members!"

At this a dozen of the fiercest locking fellows advanced upon the two men, raising their cutlasses above them, as if to cut them down, their eyes, in a concentrated pocus of light, seeming to pierce them through.

Wand returned their glances calmly; as to Bend, he leaved back so for, laughing schooly, that habe more than his scarp chan, pointing up at the ceiling, was visible.

"That will do," sail Malo, satisfied with the manner in which the twain withstood the ordeal. "After three days, you will be at liberty to leave."

Wand bowed acquiescence.

"And now for somethin' to cat!" cried Bend, "that we may be settin we are not to be starved to death."

Upon a pine table in the apartment some meat and biscuits were hid for the new-comers, who, having an excellent appet to after their late a lyentares, did full justice to the meal.

On the next night the masked man, Waki's, entered the cave. He started, on seeing Wand; then crew Malo asi's and conversed with him in a low voice.

Bend, who, at this time, was seated cut of the visit is sinh, in an angle of the rocky apartment, watched the much interest.

of his men

They closed round Wand and Bond, and conducted them to a small apartment like a cell, locking the door upon them. "What means this?" Wand had inquired. "Don't know," had been the rough answer—the only one vonchanted.

CHAPTER VIII.

IN THE RENDEZVOUS.

The moment the cutter's boat was overturned, Mary felt beself going down under water. She threw up her areas, its she did so she felt her hand grasped. Nearly sufficiented by her submersion, she was now unable to cry out. By the fall lift she saw a rough, bearded face; then felt herself closped round the waist, and drawn along through the water by an expert swimmer.

When they reached hand she was enabled, by the light of a half-extinguished lantern on the ground, to make out the prison who had saved her from drowning. He was short, breaks in thereby, with a low forchead and sunken eyes—a forbidding-looking person.

"Papa! Oh, where is papa?" cried the young girl, glancing anxiously round her; "has he not been saved, too?"

"I'm afraid not," answered the man, roughly; " whe is

She told his name.

The man shrunged his shoulders.

"Perhaps some more may be saved in a little while; or at least brought here, prisoners!"

By the noise she now heard out in the water, Mary realized that the heat's party had been attacked, a fact which she, in her confining, had not hitherto known, thinking that the man who has a larger was one of the cutter's crew; that he had come of it, a last sont from that vessel by the lie itenant.

is a table I to have the spot, but her companion confronted

" N ' so fast, miss. The captain may have something to say to you."

The son I of persons wading shoreward soon was heard.

Watson was conducted to the beach by three men, among them the smurgler, captain Malo.

The young girl, who had been released by her companion, now hurried toward the captain.

"You he i, Miss Clare?" he exclaimed. "Alas, and I can do nothing or you, as I am a prisoner."

" Papa-have you seen him?" Mary anxiously inquired.

He answered no. A moment later he was led away, cut of sight in the darkness.

Soon after captain Malo, with a couple of men, confronted Mary.

" You must go with us," said he.

She shuddered; a thrill of terror went through her.

" Go where?"

"Never mind that. You will find out, in good time."

So saying, he caught her by the arm, and, in spite of her pleadings to be permitted to walk alone, he maintained his hold. Mary mustered all her resolution and fortitude; but what could be expected of a poor girl in her situation—crenched through and through, fatigued and terrified. Completely broken down, sobs and tears escaped her.

"You need not be afraid," said Malo, roughly, "we mean no reat harm."

They had walked about a mile, when they came to a large ragon, with a team of mules.

This Mary was made to enter. Her conductors followed, and away went the wagon, the wheels keeping up a dismal greaking.

Finally the vehicle was stopped near the beach, where a soat lay in waiting.

Into this boat Mary was conducted, her companions getting to after her, and taking oars.

A few pulls carried them to a low-hulled schooner, lying about a quarter of a mile from the beach.

Aboard this vessel and down into the cabin, Mary was then red.

She was made to enter a small, neatly-furnished apartment," in which sat a young girl, apparently about her own age. She was a handsome brunette, with large, dark eyes, and hair of the same color flowing down her shoulders.

"Nettie," said Malo, "here is a companion for you. Keep your eyes on her."

"Ay, ay, father; I won't let her escape me," answered the bru-

Her manner was masculine; her black eyes flashed and winkled, as she spoke. Mary shrunk, repelled by her.

" Come, none of that," said Nettie, " but sit down here," pointug to a chair, "and behave yourself."

"You speak to me as if I was a child," said Mary, laughing.
"Pray, what means this impertinence; and why, oh, why am I brought here?" and tears flowed from the brown eyes.

"I will soon find out for you," answered Nettie, " as I like to oblige my prisoners. Do you know," she added, "I have Lad worse ones to deal with than you?"

Mary paid little attention to her words, perceiving which the bunette walked out with a flaunting air, which was also lost upon the other.

Soon she returned. She had ascertained from her father why Miss Clare had been brought here. Her parent had found out that Mary was the daughter of the merchant Herlert Clare—a man who, by pecuniary aid and other means, had done all in his power to help such parties as had been sent out in quest of smugglers. It was a mere desire of revence, therefore, that had prompted the captain to carry the girl to this retreat. Mary doubted such a story. Some other tactive must have induced the man to convey her here.

In a short time Mary made herself more comfortable by a change of attire provided by Nettie.

" There is something on your mind," said the latter, " besides your sorrow at being confined here."

Just then there was a tap at the door. Nettic opened it, when a tall, brown fellow presented her with a beautiful pair of velvet slippers.

"That is Mr. Boker, father's mate," said Nettie, after she had accepted the slippers, and rather unceremoniously shut the der in his face; "he is ever pestering me with presenta-

I don't like him, at all."

As she spoke, she tried on the slippers with a satisfied air, remarking that they would do very well for smuggled goods.

Mary paid little attention to what was going on. Seated in a corner, she mused sadly upon late events.

Mountaile the swashing of water round the schooner proclaimed that she was under way.

A few hours passed, when Mary was conducted to a boat alongside. The schooner now was lying concealed in a baj behind the conical shaped rocks among which was the smugglers' rendezvous.

Soon the boat was pulled to the bale of the peak, in the very bosem of which was Malo's retreat.

To the latter the young girl was firelly led, her descrit being accompaished by means of a repediabler.

"Come with me," said Nettie, taking the fair prister's arm, and leading her to a small, neatly furnished appropriate at one side of the passace-way, leading to the main rank, "and I will show you my other prismers.

So saying she mounted a chair, and lifting a rough sourieture langing upon the wall, disclosed an equality, through which gushed a stream of lurid light.

A feeling of curiosity for which she could har My account, ten ptod Mary to look through the sperture, when she beheld a sight that thrilled her with pity; two wasted forms, lying upon a bed of coarse straw. As she still gazed, treeves of one of these men were uplifted, when, in the linearments of the face she recognized Heavy Wand.

He knew her, too, for the light of the lamp shed a bright glare upon all objects. A wild cry escaped him; he spring up like a shot, his hand clutching one of the bars, his huming eyes glaring upon her.

"Mary," he gasped, "what are you doing here?"

"Back!" gritted Nettie, through her teeth, her eyes glaring like a tiger's epon the girl. "So you know him!"

And she pushed the young hely so viclently off the chair, that she came near spraining her ankle.

"Yes. Oh, Henry! Henry!"

"Humph! so that's the reason," cried Nettie, jungings was and confronting her, "that's the reason, is it, that he was so red and thoughtful like? Now, then," she added, aside, "I am more than ever determined to win him."

The truth was, the Landsonic person, couple's with the dunthess bravery of Ward, had made a straig in pressing upon Nettie.

The had vainly endeavored to persuade her father to give the prisoners better fare, and allow them the range of a larger spar ment

Malo, who had again seen Wilkins, Soon after Wand's confinement, had, evidently from something the masked visitor had said to him, become more harsh than before in his treatment of the two men.

This puzzled Wand, who was unable to divine his inten-

Meanwhile Malo wondered how it was that the young man 8'50 i this deprivation of food so well. Stronger men than be, the smuggler was sure, would have suffered more ere this, under the circumstances.

The fact was that, unknown to Malo, Wand had a sort of ally in his pretty daughter, Nettie, who, whenever opportunity officed, would contrive to slip a little extra food into the prisoner's hand.

This food would have kept him in a better state than he was, but for his always insisting on sharing it with Bend.

CHAPTER IX.

SHOT!

NETTIE replaced the picture over the opening in the wall. "Oh, to think that he same is come to this!" sobbed Mary.

Nettie watched her steadily a moment, then strugging ler sloullers, she walked out of the apartment, locking the door after her.

The next moment Mary heard a noise in the adjoining to 1, heard a door open as if the prisoners had been lead tway.

Monding the chair and looking through the grating, sac

I by or sufficient Wand, made her now lose entire sight of all the same on his account.

May and Wand had been lovers, that she thought it would there be best for the prisoners to be transferred to some other cell.

This was done. They were conducted to an apariment, muller even than the one they had left, by Malo's mate, Mr. Boker.

Did the latter see any thing in the eyes of Nettie to excite his jealousy, as he led the twain forth?

Certain it is, that he was more than usually severe with them.

He carried a stout staff, with which he struck Bend a blow across the back to quicken his movements. Bend's wrists were both secured with irons. He turned, however, and for an instant looked steadily at Boker, the whites of his eyes fairly seeming to turn green.

"You rascal!" cried Wand; "who gave you orders to strike a bound prisoner?"

Boker showed his teeth. Then, up went his staff, as if he was about to strike the speaker.

He would have done so but for an interruption. Netties sprung forward and caught his arm, her eyes flashing fire.

"Never again dare to attempt to strike this man!" she said, showing her brilliant teeth.

Boker shrunk back, completely cowel.

That same day a visitor came to the rendezvous. It was the masked man-Wilkins.

He drew Malo aside. For a long time the two conversed in a low tone.

When they separated, and Wilkins left the retreat, Nettie slyly opened the door of the cell where the prisoners had first been confined.

She had heard all that passed between her father and his visitor. Soon after, in the evening, she repaired to the prisoners' cell.

This apartment was another of those convenient hellows, with which the smugglers' retreat about led. Before his continement, Wand had ascertained that there were at least ten different apartments in the chiffy rendezvous.

Some previous convulsion of nature had overturned the rocks, and piled them in grotesque masses, with openings leading in and out, forming a number of curious caveras, both large and small. The young man had heard that there was another means of exit from the retreat, besides the rope-ladder, a narrow passage leading to a small opening, ten feet above the beach. This way, Malo had resolved never to use except in case of an attack, when flight should be becessary. He kept the opening blocked up by a large rock, so thickly overhung with brambles, vines and other shrubbery, that it could not be seen by any person on that side.

A dozen men, however, could dislodge the rock with one hard push.

"Mr. Wand," said Nettie, in a low voice, "I have come to set you free."

"Many thanks," said Wand, joyfully. "I'm sure I shall be glad enough to get away from here."

"A plot has been hatched, by which you are to be made prisoner by naval men. Even now they are waiting for a signal to posmice upon this place and take you."

"And what have naval men to do with smugglers?" in Quired Wand, much surprised.

"A certain person named Wilkins," answered Nettie, "is anxious to capture you. I have overheard his conversation with father, by which I have discovered that it was he who induced the captain to put you in confinement. Otherwise you would have been permitted, as was agreed, when you joined the League, to have this place, three days later. Wilkins, who is a cunning rascal, made a plan with father to keep you here, until he could see the officers of a certain cutter"—here Nettie's eyes gleamed with a peculiar expression—"and, without of course letting them know his connection with our smugglers, lead them to this rendezvous, that they might make an attack upon it, when, of course, you would be captured with the rest."

While she was speaking, Bend had watched her intently, a flagularly shrewd expression lighting his face.

" You will free me, too?" said he.

"No," replied Nettie, shrugging her shoulders. "I have nothing to do with you. Besides, the boat in which I am to "I.v.y M. Wand would not hold three people."

"Hamph!" mattered Bend. "I could swim, as to that

t. Hiter."

The girl looked impatient.

" It would cause delay. There is no time to lose."

" You are going with Captain Wand?"

"None of your business."

"I twig," said Bend, scratching his breast with his chin; you're in love with the captain! Ha! ha!"

"I am sure you are mistaken," said Wand, in a voice of displeasure. "It is kindness alone that actuates this young woman."

Nettie gave him a grateful glance. Her dark eyes beamed tenderly upon him.

He endeavored to persuade her to free his companion, also, but she would not do so. .. .

Wand then shook hands with Bend.

"I am sorry you are not included, my man," said he.

"Never mind, sir," replied Bend, "my chin will sarve me yet."

"Come," whispered Nettie; "there is no time to lese."

So saying she unfastened the handcutts upon his wrists with the key which she had obtained from her father's apartment, and led him out of the cell.

The passage-way was dark and deserted. She locked the cell door; then, with her companion, mounted the regularder.

Conducting Wand down the precipice, she bade him enter a small skitf near the strip of beach at its base.

The boat soon was gliding out from the rocky labyrinth to-

"Where are we going?" inquire! Wand, as Nettle vigor-onsly plied the paddles.

"I am going to take you to your clipper," she answered.

"I know where it is. It is not a league from here."

"I am glad to hear that!" exclaimed Wan I, j yf lly.

"Well you may be. You are needed aboard, as there is a level se cutter between here and Vera Cruz."

" Captain Watson's vessel," nattered Wan l.

"Bout aboy!" came a retch hall, at that moment, from a rock about ten yards to the left.

At the same moment, a number of lanterns flashed, reveal-

"We are discovered!" cried the girl, whirling the shall eround, "but I know of a cavernous retreat, up in the cliff we quitted, below the rendezvous, where you can conceal yourself without being discovered."

53

As she spoke, a man, in a lieutenant's uniform, was seen be, ling far over from one of the rocks—a pistol in his fand.

The glare of the lanterns, meanwhile, fell full upon the person of Nettie's companion.

"It is Captain Wand! Hold, there-I know you!" shouted the houtenest; "you can not escape us. Stop, or I thre!"

Notice, however, continued to ply her paddles.

o D. wa," she whispered to Wand, "crouch down until we get behind that rock, you see ahead."

He was about obeying, when crack! went the pistol, and the young man fell into the bottom of the boat.

Y n have kill hin! he is I at!" screamed Nettie, as the lost glided behind the rock, beyond.

The so in lef oars was now heard.

The Restaunt, determined to make sure he had killed his man, was soon in pursuit.

Unreprinted with the rocky labyrinths, he was soon fast in a pretraling with on a level with the water, from which he was made, for some time, to extricate the boat.

When, at last, he got it clear, he made a vain search for the skiff and its occupants.

"I couldn't have missed him," remarked the licutenant to a midshipman. "I'm quite sure my shot did its duty. That woman, whoever she may be, is welcome to the body."

Still, he continued his search, which, however, proved fruitlecs.

CHAPTER X.

AFLOAT AGAIN.

MARY sat in the same apartment, her face buried in her hands, giving way to her grief.

It was the morning after Wand had been shot. She had not yet heard of the event.

Suddenly there was a terrific noise! The hollow passages of the mountain cave rung with the report of firearms, with the shouts of men, the hasty trampling of feet.

"What can be the matter?"

"Oh, miss!" exclaimed Nettie, suddenly rushing into the room, "our enemies have found us out. The rendezvous is attacked!"

"Thank God! then he may be saved!" said Mary.

"You forget that he is a smuggler, too—this Wand of yours—and that a price is set upon his head. The place is attacked by a naval man of war, a cutter, anchored off our coast."

Mary bowed her beautiful head. There seemed no hope for Wand.

Meanwhile the din without was suddenly hushed; all was still.

The door of the apartment opened. Mary drew back, with a cry of surprise, as Captain Watson entered.

"Thank Heaven, you are safe!" Le exclaimed. "I have found you at last."

"Oh, Captain Watson! have you seen any thing of my father ?"

your account. We have been searching hard for you, ever since you were missed. We followed up your tracks and those of the smugglers closely—we looked in every nook and corner, in vain. Finally, we reached these cliffs, discovered the rendezvous, and planned this surprise. It pleases me much that it is my good fortune to rescue you."

" You will take me to my father?" cried Mary.

" Certainly."

He conducted her out of the cave.

From the summit of the cliff, she could see the cutter far away, the Stars and Stripes fluttering at her mizzen.

The sight would have cheered her; but for the thought of Captain Wand, who was, she believed, now Watson's prisoner.

Where-where-is HE?" she at length ventured to ask-

" Captain Wand?"

An exultant expression momentarily lighted her companion's face. He turned aside to hide it, and, with pretended sadness, answered:

"Have you not heard?"

" No, sir-what?"

"He was shot dead, last night, while attempting to es-

Mary staggered back, half fainting, white with agony.

Watson clenched his teeth at this proof of attachment to Wand.

"Are you sure?" she gasped; "is there not some mis-

"I think not, although I have some questions to ask a certain young woman, who was with him at the time, endeavoring to help him get off, as my lieutenant informed me. That woman could have been none other than the one we just left—the smurgler captain's daughter, probably. I have put a guard at the door of her apartment, so that she can not get off un til I can ask the question I intend."

He then narrated the particulars of Wand's shooting as .

has already been told.

Mary's face lighted up.

"There may have been some mistake. He may have only been wounded."

"There is what I wish to find out from the girl."

"1) not let us put it off!" cried Mary; "we will question her at once."

They descended into the cave and questioned Nettie.

She looked at Miss Clare steadily, her eyes flashing strangely.

"You will never see him again."

.

"He was shot dead, then?" said Watson. "What made you put off with his body after he was shot?"

"Because I did not think he was really dead," said Nettie.

"I got ashore and looked at him, however, to perceive that it was all over with him. He expired, soon after. Father's mate came along, just then, and together we dropped the body into the sea!"

"Dead! dead!" wailed Mary.

"Nay," said Watson; "he is better off than he would have been, had he been captured, as he would, in that case, have been tried and disgraced by a court-martial, before being executed."

Vainly the captain endeavored to soothe her.

Her eyes became wilder; she fell fainting in Nettie's

When she recovered, there was a change in her situation. She lay on a soft couch, her father kneeling by her side.

"Where am I?"

Gol! you are found, at lest. That rescally surger capt in was evidently waiting until a large reward should be effected for you, when he would have found some means to have you restored to my arms, and to obtain his nevery with at setting hims if in trouble. Every thing has come out nearly right. Even the blue clipper is now in sight, and our captain's houtenant is in pursuit."

"And where is HE?" inquired Mary, as she vainly en leavored to remember what had happened.

"Oh, yes! No wonder you ask for him. I have provised you to him, for he is a noble young n.m. Since you were lost, he has not not been able to rest, night or day. He asked me, if he found you and restored you to my and would I consent to his making you his wit? Of corse.

By I always thought you seemed to like him, I answere hyes; that was, provided you too would race. Let me persuade you, my child, to listen to him, and—"

"Of whom do you speak, papa?"

" Captain Watson!"

"No-no," she sail, shuddering, "it was not him I asked for; it was Henry-Henry!"

Mr. Ciare turned pale.

"Unfortunate young man! You must no longer think of him; but try and dismiss from your mind one who proved a traitor to his Government, and be thankful that he died as he dil!"

Recollection was slowly dawning on the young girl's mind; yet she struggled to keep back the dreadful truth—to fancy that she had had some terrible dream, and that she now misunderstood her parent.

"He is aboard the cutter, I suppose," she said, wildly-

"Oh, papa, you must help him escape."

"What mean you, my child? There! there! calm your self, and dismiss these thoughts from your mind," said Mr. Clare, shothingly. "Hark!" he suddenly added, "there is the order to fire, on deck. They are within range of the bire clipper, and she will be captured!"

The thunder of a gun now made every timber aboard the cutter rattle.

The din seemed fairly to crash through Mary's brain; it brain; t vividly to her mind the dreadful truth of her lover's having been shot.

"I remember now!" she wailed, and fell back upon her pillow.

CHAPTER X1.

CUTTING OUT.

The noises in the smulglers' rendezvous were of course I, and by Bend.

" The place is sartiply attacked," muttered he, "and there's ar., of my bein' taken from here."

for noises censed. The door was opened; some of Wat-

"You are our prisoner."

"Look at my chin, will ye," said Bend, "and tell me if it ain't an honest one." He had his sou'wester pulled so far down over his face, that only the chin was visible.

"You're a smuggler. We had it from the smuggler captain's own daughter."

Bend strugged his shoulders, and asked for something to eat, saying he was half starved. One of the men pulsed a hard sea-bisenit from his pocket and presented it. Bend's handcuffs having been taken off, he endeavoted to reach the bisenit, but could not, much of his strength having described him since his confinement. He dropped the bisenit to the floor of his cell, and, kneeling down, struck it a blow with his sharp chin, thus breaking it into four parts.

The seamen were amused.

One of them threw him another biscult and told him to break that in the same way.

"Ay, ay," answered Bend, "but I must have sea-room. This ere floor is too rough. Take me outside in the passage-way, and I'll show you a trick worth seeing. I'll jist that this biskit in air catchin' it on my chin, and breaklin' it in the catch."

"Good-that's trickery for you!" crie'l one.

They conducted him outsi'e.

"Now stand asile, so as to give me rem," he sail, mo-

They separated around him. He tossed the lisewit so that it went up outside the ring of spectat rs in I sing him, toward the rope-hadder leading out of the opening.

He ran as if to catch it on his chin Instead of doing so, however, he kept on, speeding like a sixt toward the repetabler. Several pistels cracked, his intention to escape being now evident, but not one of the bolies struck blan.

With the colority of a will lout, he month it a repolabler, passed through the opening, and with a few thous of his sheath-knife outling the halber in two, spei on has a shot, down the steep declivity.

Reaching the base of the cliff, he behild a small skiff lying near a rock. Into the 2 the best he spine, and, with much difficulty, finally successful in grining the sucre.

He darted along, parsard, now and two, to take breath and look behind him. There was as yet no sign of his pursers to be sea, although he fancied he could hear the its in the distance.

Half dead with fatigue, he arrived in a courle of days at Vera Cruz.

The first object that here met his sight was the blue clipper, Dolphin, lying almost alongside of Captain Watson's vessel—the cutter Roland.

At this sight, Bend uttered a prolonged whistle. Then he squatted down upon the wharf, bringing his hand down upon his knee with a hearty slap.

" Captured; ay, ay, captured!"

Suddenly the pupils of his eyes expanded; the white rings around them diluted. He could see only one man about pacing the deck, the officer of the watch being seated aft, apparently asleep. He sprung to his feet, as if a sudden idea had crossed his mind.

"One thing is certain," he muttered, "a man can't do any

So saying he entered a small tavern and partook of some

This seant meal refreshed his sinewy frame at once.

He lingered round the city, until near dark, when he enterel one of the boats lying manned by youthful oarsmen-most of them Mexicans—alongside the wharf.

"Pull for that blue clipper!"

" Si, senor."

The ours splushel, and the boat flew. When alongside the clipper, it was quite dark.

"Al oy, there, who's that?" came from the vessel's deck.

" Me," answere I Ben I, disgulsing his voice.

As he spoke he throw the Mexican a piece of money; then he spring from the boat into the schooner's fore chains.

"Who the deace is 'me'?" came the same voice which hal spoken before.

Somebody approached; it was too dark to distinguish faces. But is all only spring over the rail, rushed upon the man, cought him by the throat and dealt him a blow that stunned him. Posting down through the dukness, he distinguished the rail dress of one of Watson's men. This was evidently the of the watch. Where were the rest?

Brad had performed a daring movement, but he felt his

"What's the matter, forward, there?" combittee authorita-

"All right, sir," retarted Bend, discribing his voice as much as possible, "I then the something was good to be and us."

Bent, now, with great cel sily, possed I to envelop himself in the caped clock the sail rhal wirm.

Not a moment too soon was this acc and its le

The officer came forward, holding a lint in he had precircl from the main rigging. Bink, pulling the soulwester he had taken from the man over his brows, hastened to meet him.

"You say you thought some one was trying to board."

"Ay, ay, sir."

e Well, lock out sharp, new. Remember, you are the only person besides myself about from the enter?

"I the ght so; but I am qualitie proven! was B ni's he'atal comment.

"Ay, ay, sir," healled, also himitaring as well as he could, the house tones of the saler who had had hid him.

"Look sharp at the Lock s, n was loten, to take sure they are all right. Remember, to rear court birty of these informal smallers yet about 1, could be limited to 11."

" Ay, ay, sir."

The officer walked aft, leaving Bend to C. File inwordly at the success of his simple r = -a may, however, which he doubted would have some led but for the latheres, and for the fact of his being about the same high as the man he had knocked down.

Having seed the officer return to the quarter-lock, at least himself who reduced them I for it. the quarter-lock will be a formal panion way. But deliberately will be it the formation at the formation of Theorem 1 is the formation of the second and a crowder, then I to to the river a total of the second so as to hold it firmly.

The Caper Col man some distributed that the million the forecastle.

"Who's that?" implied a dent is selected with and was one between the birts. He produced it, and struck a light, after first emefully reclesing the scuttle, that the glare

1... bt not be seen from the quarter-deck.

Let a be of him, their shipmate, the poor fellows would be a required by a regardence being with questions, but for his enjoining their chain. This, the collection of the particle for a letter their chain. This, the collection of the particle for the forestell steps, was festered to attach their chain by turns carefully taken for a particle is a firmly that, by their own efforts, they were unable to displace them.

The signate the chain them the post would insure the freecern of the pristure, who, how ver, having no instrument for the page, were, then, class, unable to do so.

De the state of the bold through an epening in the bulk-

Tre cardings at the attroopen off, and the prisoners were free.

"What is was that?" now came from the officer of the ceck.

"Lave I in to me," soil Bind, while you run on deck-n to you -- out the coble, be on the fore and foretopsall, and the mainsail."

With these works, he spring on dock, and rurning of, it willing if upon the officer with unexpected subdenness, which is then own the original in-way. Meanwhile the other non, it once on prehen it glais intuition, obeyed the orders he had given.

There was a read off-shore wind—almost a gale—blowing at this time, so that the blue object, ripidly swinzing round, but only dared of like an arrow away from the cutter.

Cles on I shouts, with the histy transpling of feet-the flex log of her ten, e.e., proclaimed that the cutter's watch had the cles the strain desperance of the clipper.

It was several minutes, however, ere a gen could be cleared away. Then there was a broad, built thish, and a twelve-look bertiond of, ser Torriss let whizzing after the chiper, how chapped in the lathness.

The Dilliams by this time buff a burne distant.

" Cher away that ten paraber, ferward!" should Bad.

The non with abouty obeyed every order of their shipmate, all their chiers have a taken about the cutter.

44 FIRE!"

The lightning and thunder of the gun were seen and heard. In the lurid, instantaneous gleam, the sinewy figure of the Cape Cod man was discovered looming up as he stood on the clipper's quarter-rail waving his hat round his head.

"How d'ye like my chin!" he screamed "Ha! ha!"

"BANG?" from the cutter again.

The sea, lashed to foam, gleamed weirdly in the lurid flash. Bend's long chin, white-ringed eyes, as his lithe body, bent over from the rail almost touching the water, were again visible.

His voice went up like a hyena's as he shouted:

"CHEERS FOR THE BLUE CLIPPER !"

" HOORAY! HOORAY! HOORAY!" responded the swarthy crew.

The schooner keeled over still further to leeward, cloud upon cloud of canvas was unrolled to her very trucks, and humming defiance, she sped on through the white, rolling waters!

CHAPTER XII.

IN THE CAVE.

For several days Mary Clare kept her apartment.

Her father was glad to see her at length come on deck.

Then the blue clipper and Wand were again spoken of.

"We had that clipper captured—alongside of us in the harbor of Vera Cruz," said he, "a week ago! but, by some means or other—how none of us have been able to make cut—she escaped!"

Mary sighed. She took little interest in the vessel, now that her commander was gone.

Days passed. Mr. Chare watched anxiously, floring she was going into a decline.

Watson had no effect but that of the most decided repulsion, on her, now.

" My time will come," he muttered.

"Have you overtaken those escaped smugglers, yet?" MI

" No, sir."

"Too bad," said Clare.

"I shall make my last hunt for them, to-day," said Watton. "Then away we go, on another cruise, after that confounded blue clipper."

With an armed boat's crew he was ashore, soon after. The men hunted in all directions, but met with no better success than before.

At night Watson was hurrying toward the beach where he had left the boat, picking his way by the moonlight down the steep cliff in which had been the smugglers' rendezvous, when he saw ahead of him a female figure, keeping in shadow as much as possible; he followed this figure, which he soon recognized as that of the smuggler's daughter, Nettie.

Lately the guard had been withdrawn from this cliff, so that the girl could now go and come as she liked.

Following her cautiously, Watson at length saw her enter the opening of a cavernous retreat, half concealed by vines. He still followed, and saw her reach the other end of the cave. She palled out a large stone. Another opening was visible, through which she crawled. This, like the place she had just left, was lighted by a lamp.

"Ay, ay," muttered Watson—"this cliff seems to abound in caverns, hollows and all sorts of winding passages. A criminal might easily conceal homself here without fear of detection."

The truth was, as he subsequently ascertained, that Nettie, on the night her skiff was pursued by Watson's lieutenant, hal known that the young man was not shot dead.

She had guided the light vessel to the foot of the precipice, and, concealing her skiff in a hollow, had helped Wand, who had mere'y been struck in the calf of the leg, by the lieutenant's shot, up the acclivity to the cave which now contained him.

It had, at one period, I een used for a store-house.

Some straw, and plenty of old sails were there. Here Nettie made Wand a comfortable couch of the sails, and here the had nursed him ever since he was shot.

Now as Watson gazed, he noticed how her eyes sparkled upon the young captain. He shrugged his shoulders.

"I'll soon spoll it: Il," thought be. With these wer is draw ing a pistol, he sprung upon the year a nam.

"You are mine at las'-ha! ha! captain of the thre clip-Per."

He pointed the pistol at his lead.

" Get yourse'f realy to go with me," he all !.

Wand had started, and like a walf at hap, he may stad glaring at the speaker.

" Move and I fire!" shoute! Watson.

"I will not bulge an inch to go with you," Wand quittly answered.

"What mean you, sir?" inquired Nettle, patting herself between the two. "What mean you? How can be go with you, so far, when he is just able to walk. A few days ago he could not limp even a few steps. No, you must not expect it."

As she spoke, she leaned over toward the lamp up in the wall and blew it out. All was darkness in the cave.

Watson saw a figure rece log before him. He ciscl tree! his pistol, and, by the momentary flish, perceived be had made a mistake. The person was Nettle, who, with a sitematical pierced to the heart.

Watson lighted the lamp with matches, taken from a sa all tobacco-case in his pocket.

He tent ever the young woman. She was deal. He rashed to the opening in the side of the case, to see a repart dealing far down, and compactanded by this that bland had nade his exit, probably before the pistal was that.

Sall bent upon securing him, notwit so and the four mi-take he had just made, he discussed the majo, to had ton the beach at the lase of the step 1 K.

By the moor light he could detect the trains of the fight is test. A skiff, which had been their your, was given to an it was evident, had by that made his escape.

Sallenly he beard shous in the distance.

"My men have captured him. Ay, it must be so. Hele fallen into their clutches."

Looking out serward, however, he perceived the cause of the shouts he had heard. Wand was there, putting off in the skill. He had been seen by Watson's men on the beach. "Ho! for my boat!" screamed the captain. "Til toon have

The soon reached his boat, alongside the beach, by means of a sale 'er one, in which he had come to this point. His han al there, were soon in their places.

"G're way! Twenty doll is to the man who pulls the Les our in chase of you ler ski.f."

The men cheerel and worked with a will.

The long boat glided rapidly in the wake of the skiff, fast living upon it.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE PRISONER.

DEND was one of those strong-willed men, who, taking the led in critical moments, are it mediately acknowledged as led is. Moreover, he was one of the best sailors his ship-lates had ever seen, and seemed to have an excellent knowledge of navigation. As a commander, his manner seemed is improve. His grant figure straightening, assumed a dignity it had not hitherto shown; even his language at times improved.

A sloop of war had given chase to him, soon after is but of ther sight in a few hours.

Not until B nd was several days at sea, did he hear from In of the n. n-who had had it from some of the cutter's fr.w-tilit Wan I hal been shot.

The mash chaffered him deeply. He had actually bowed his heal and so I tears. Finally be questioned the man as to where he had been full perticulars of the event. The said was able to live him every information, as the man who had a necessionally put on grand over the prisoners aboard the D. Blin had been communicative.

Ti : round eyes of Bend underwent many changes as be listened.

"How did Watson know Wand was in the cave?" he

"Perhaps he had reason to suspect it."

The Cape Cod man shrurged his sheulders. Then he walked the quarter-deck rapidly and thoughtfully for some time.

Soon after he changed the vessel's course, heading toward Vera Cruz.

He kept on until he came in sight of the conical rocks, whence he had made his escape from Watson's men.

It was now morning; he kept his vessel of se hauled, standing off and on. Far away to the castward a craft hay at anchor.

Ben I, inspecting it with his glass, recognized the revenue cutter, the crew of which, owing to the blue color of his vessel, had not, it was evilent, yet seen him!

From the crew he now picked out an old salt who had sailed the sea for ferty years, and held a long conversation with him, the upshot of which was that the old salt was to take command of the blue clipper during his absence.

"Don't let any thing capture you," said Bend, "that is if you can help it. Keep off shore at night, as much as pessible, and show a red and thee light, for which I shall be on the watch."

"Ay, ay, sir," answered the old saller, who, next to Bend, was the best seaman in the ship.

At night the Cape Cod man donnel a pair of duck pants, a Guernsey frock and a seni-wester.

Then he went ashore in a bout, which he immediately sent back to the schooner.

He walked rapidly along the beach until nearly opposite the light of the cutter, lying at at half a learne distant, when, coolly pulling off his Guerney, and tying it rotal his wast, he struck out for the cutter.

He was an excellent swimmer, and in a few minutes he arrived alongside.

"Alloy, there!" he shouted, "te ye all asleep on deck, there?"

Instantly a face was thrust over the rail.

" Who's that?"

"Me," answered Bend. "I'm a poor castaway that wants to ship."

A rope was thrown him, and he clambered aboard, to be surrounded by a number of sailors, among them the officers of the watch.

"What do you want here?" inquired the latter. "Who are you ?"

"My name's Jim Catch," answered Bend, stroking his chin.
"I was wrecked in the schooner Packer, off this coast. I've made my way here, hopin' you'll ship me, as your vessel is the only American one in these dirgin's."

As Bend's manner seemed sincere, the officer said he would speak to the captain. He did so, and Watson at once came on deek to look at the man.

He inspected him closely, without recognizing him, as it had been too dark for him to obtain a good view of this person, on that night when he went to the assistance of Wand at Mr. Clare's mansion.

The quick eye of the captain at once showed him that Bend was every inch a sailor. As he needed a couple of men, he immediately consented to ship the new-comer.

"I pull a good oar," said Ben l, "and would like, if you've no objection, to pull in your boat."

As this request was a natural one, the captain thought nothing of the remark.

down upon the book.

He was sent forward to at once attend to his duties.

At about midhight, the captain had his quarter-boat iowered Bond had been chosen to pull the amidships, in place of a man who, owing to the shortness of his arms, did not give sat if action in hardling so long an oar.

The boat soon struck the beach. Muffled in a cloak, the captain departed, after exchanging a few words with his coxswain.

Soon after he was gone, Bend sauntered along the beach.

The coaswain called him back.

" Who gave you orders to leave the boat?"

"I was only going a little ways," answered Bend, "you tartinly won't object to that." "If you'll come back in half an hour, you may go," answered the coxswain, who had thus by Watson been instructed to deal with the men.

"I sartially will be back in that time, sie," answer I Berd —at once winning the conswain to good will by "sirring " land. He moved along until out of sight of the boot, when he says is rapidly in the direction Watson had taken.

Meanwhile, the captain kept on for about a mile, when, we the angle of a rock, he met a tall figure, muffled in a cleak.

The two men communed together for some time.

It was pitch dark, so that mother could see the face of the other.

Suddenly the fall moon burst forth from behind a thick cloud. Then the faces of both men were distinctly revealed to the watchful gaze of Bend, crouching in the shalow of a clump of shrubbery, within ten feet of the speakers. The light eyes of the Cape Cod man gleamed like a will-cat's, as be listened, while his orbs expanded to thrice their natural size. He turned, as the moon was again hillen, and in less than half an hour, was again by the bout.

Nearly another hell-hour passed ere Captain Wats a returned, bearing with him something under his clark.

The eyes of Bend might have been seen, through the darkness, to scintillate like sparks of fire.

The boat was soon alongside the cutter, where it was left, not to be heisted until next day, as there was work to be dene on the outside of the cutter.

It was Bend's watch on deck for two Lours ofter. He caudously crept aft, and peering down through the grating in the cabin, he behold a sight, which seemed to interest him much: Captain Watson carefully inspecting a ledger took he had obtained, and making copies from it up in a large that roll of paper.

"What are you doing, there?" said a gruff voice belied Bend.

The Cape Cool man sprung to his feet, to conficut the officer of the watch.

"Beg pardin, sir," he said, humbly—"but it looked so nice down there, sir, d'ye see—"

"Go forward, where you belong."

Bend, humbly saluting, slunk forward. When his time on deck had explod, he did not go below.

With the wrent these of a lynx, he sat in the foretop, his eyes turned aft.

The allier of the watch had gone below to call his relief.
Un came the captain, a moment later, and moved over to the later of the watch had gone below to call his relief.

There was a light splash as he threw the article into the sea, then retreated into the cabin.

But is seemed rapidly to the deck. He crept swiftly tway entil nearly amidship, when he dropped into the boat lying alongside. From this he lowered himself into the sea, and dove like a shark into the clear waters, procuring the thing the equal had thrown over, ere it had sunk many fathoms. It was a long manuscript book, which Bend thrust quickly bush his Gernsey. He then returned to the deck before the other watch had come up.

At daylight the officer of the deck ordered Bend aft. He was sent pro the cabin as a gard—there being no marines in the cutter—over a prisoner, who, he was informed, had recally been capared. The presoner was confined in an appropriate in the cabin, the door of which was locked upon Lim.

Wat on, however, had taken the prediction to have an arme! man stationel, night and day, at the door. The men relieved each other regularly, at this post, every two hours.

Provided with the calless which the deck officer had given him, Bent soon was pacing to and ho by the door.

A fier now appeared at a small opening—a sort of grating from Reion in the top of the door.

B . I drew back unable to repress a slight cry of surprise,

: . I . / I Cattin Wan!!

Leen informed had been shot!

The Cape Carl area on Al senectly believe his senses. His Joy was excessive, at recountaing Wand, alive and well.

"G cri," sail the young man, "will you inform the captain that I need some fresh drinking-water, here. That which has been left me is no better than bilge-water."

Bend glancing carefully around him, to make sure that no person was within hearing, answered in his natural vaice, at the same time holding up his finger to caution the prisoner.

" Ay, ay, Captain Wand."

Wand started.

"I know that voice," he said, in a whisper.

"Ay, captain, it is me—Bend," answered the Cape Cod roon, now drawing back, so that from Lis position, Wand might obtain a good view of him.

At that moment, approaching steps were heard.

Wand gave Bend a significant look, and at once removed his face from the opening.

The next moment Captain Watson appeared.

"Wand!" he exclaimed, loud enough for the young man to hear him, "your blue clipper has again hove in sight, and as there is a frigate to windward of her, she can not escape us except by running upon the rocks of the coast."

"I expected this," the young man answered. "Ay, I expected it."

"A court-martial will then be held, sir, and you will probably he sentenced to be hung at the yard-arm !"

As this announcement passed the lips of Watson, Mary Clare, who, seated in her room, was a victim to the most poignant anguish at her lover's capture, neard those dreadfal words.

She had seen the young man brought aboard on that night when, in his skiff, he had endeavored vainly, as the secret shows, to escape Watson's long-boat.

By the glare of the ship's lanterns, the lovers had recegnized each other.

Mr. Clare, also on deck, had approached the prisoner, as he was being led below.

"Unfortunate young man," he had said, noticing the sail, pale countenance of Wan !—" I am very sorry—very, to see you; ir this plight; the more so, as your treachery will evidently be punished with a hasty, ignominatous death."

Mary Clare had tottered toward her lover, and fallen down in a swoon, partly from joyous surprise at seeing him alive, mingled with the painful reaction of feeling at the thought of the gloomy fate before him.

She had, however, indulged faint hopes of his escape—had thought that something might turn up in his favor. The words of Watson, on this day, however, drowned every

She went on deck to breathe the pure sea air, for there was a stifling sensation in her throat.

Not long was she there, when Watson came to her side.

turned to leave him, when he gently laid his hand on her arm.

"I have something to say concerning Mr. Wand," he said.
She pursed and he went on, having first glanced around him—to make size there was no danger of his being heard.

" Wan I will be tried-condemned to death. It rests with you to save him."

" With me?"

"Yes. Consent to be my wife, and I will use my utmost to leavors to get him clear—ay, you must, by this time, have guessed the state of my feelings toward you, and I know I can d pend upon you to keep secret what I am about to say.

"I will contrive that Wand shall escape from my vessel. He shall conceal himself where he can not be found, and shall subsupportly leave for some European port. The man is young, and some allowance must be made for the temptations of youth. He was probably beguited into the smuggler business by some arcful person, older than himself."

" Nay," sail Mary, "do not try to cover your motives thus."

"I have no wish to What I say I mean. If you will be by wife, the youth shall go free."

Sie gave him a haughty glance.

"No, sir. Wand would not buy his freedom thus. Sooner Will be perish—sooner would I see him perish, than suffer the Yony of my being another's."

With this she swept away and descended to her room.

Watson's face grew black. -

"The youth shall suffer the worst," he muttered-" ay, the very worst !"

The cutter, which, by this time, was well under way, was blowing up blue water in rapid chase of the clipper, about a league distant

To windward the frigate also was rapidly overhauling her.
She was standing along the coast under every thing she could

Suddenly a gun boomed over the sea from the frigate, and the jib-boom of the clipper flew to splitters.

The decks of the cutter were new crewded with her men, all jubilant at what seemed a certain prespect of capturing the long-sought-for prize.

Another shot become labour from the frig te, or hagain the switchers flew from the clipper has weather specifically her foremast was seen to go by the bear h.

Cheers now rung from the currer's erev.

She had come up into the wird, with every sell flapping. The war-vessel bore down upon her, and, in a few minutes, she was lying alongside—under the guns of the frigate—a captured prize!

"Good!" said Watson, rub' ing his hands.

"This, unfortunately, is only one party of the lawless fellows," remarked Mr. Clare. "I wish we could find out the rendezvous of them all."

Signals were now exchanged between Watson's vessel and the frigate. The young man had his best lowers, and went aboard.

In a f w hours he returned with marines, and issued orders to his first lieutenant.

Wand was then led up from below. The young man looked strangely indifferent, until Mary Clare came to take a last look at the prisoner, who, she had been it trued, was to be transferred to the frighte.

Then he turned his face away, as, har leaff, i and guarded by the marines, he was led into the boat alongside.

Pale and tearless, Mary leaned over the full watching him, until she could see him no longer. Then she wert below, and her father vainly endeavored, all that day, to draw her from her apartment, from which, new and then came call stiffed sobs.

CHAPTER XIV.

FIRE!

On the morning after Nettie, as described, had been accidentally shot by Watson, Captain Malo, with half a dozen men, entered the cave.

At sight of his child, lying dead before num, on the rocky floor of the cavern, the smuggler gave way to sincere demonstrations of grief.

Heartless as the man had always been, he had loved his daughter deeply. Proud of her dark beauty, he had spent hundreds of dollars that she might have the means of decking her person in such attire as would set off her charms.

It was in fact partly for her sake that he had entered into his lawless but profitable calling, hoping in time to retire with a large fortune, and live like a gentleman, as he expressed it, with Nettie to grace his mansion.

Now his fondest hopes were dashed to the ground. He bowed his head upon his breast, and sobbed aloud.

"Avenge her! avenge her!" said a voice behind him, when, turning, he beheld Boker.

"Hush!" sail the captain, sternly.

"Ay, I understand," mounted Boker, "for the sake of having that fellow to-"

Again Malo checked him; then he stooped and kissed his child.

A moment later she was borne from the cavern.

At right, two d ys after, a grave was dug beneath a talpainter's tree, and there the remains of Nettie, inclosed in a break-one coffia, which Mads had had made by one of his skip's carpenters, was haved.

Sally the equities tracel away from the spot, as the last Shovelf I of early was " nown men the grave.

All was still ar and become the hooting of a solitary night-

Soon, however, a crippled form, supported by a stick, limped to the grave.

It was Boker, who, during the retreat from the rendezvous, had fallen and nearly broken his legs.

He threw homself down, and went like a child. At full length he by upon the grave, his face to the earth, solding and mouning.

Suddenly a shadow fell upon the ground. The moon had thereged from behind a cloud, so that this shadow was sharply defined.

Boker saw it not-saw not Watson, who now steed behind him.

The captain touched him with his foot. The man t rued round, beheld the intru ler, and, with a howl, sprung to his feet-

"See what you have done—see there!" walled Boler, pointing at the grave—"the only being I ever love I on carth sleeps forever—murdered by your hand!"

"I seel sorry for you," answere! Watson, "b t s y net murdered. I fired at another, and the shot struck ber."

dark. It was brutal carelessness. You shall suffer for it. I will have my revenge."

"What do you mean? Be careful. In reality, Captain Wand was the main cause of the accident, as, had not be been there, I would not have fired. Well, you have be your revenge. I captured Wand, and he is now a hand cuffed prisoner aboard the frighte! He will be disgraced—le will die an ignoble death."

This allusion to the man whom Boker had deep 1 Lis for vored rival, was like putting fel on fl.e.

"For fired the shot, you did the dod. I repeat, I will be reveneed. You know what I mean!"

Watson turned as pide as death.

"Come with me aboard the cutter," he sold, sternly. " Yell are my prisoner!"

Weak and crippled though he was, Boker raked the s he carried, aiming a friends blow at Wilson

The latter easily dodaing it, sizes the materly the tire and drew him along, a short distance

Then, applying a whistle to his mouth, he was some just by several of his men, evidently come from his boat, lying alongside the beach.

Among them was Bend.

The prisoner said something in Spanish—a language not understood by the men.

Watson smiled triumphantly.

"Here is a smuggler I have captured," said he; "take him to the boat."

He was obeyed, and the man was soon in the cutter's run. He sat down on a coil of rigging, apparently buried in deep thought.

Then he rose, and, fumbling in his pocket, drew forth a small match-box.

for. He thinks, by keeping me here, to prevent the revenge I would have taken. Be it so; I will take another. This result shall never leave her anchorage at this place. If I could make sure that he would finish with her, as I probably shall, then I would be satisfied."

He crept forward until his hands came in contact with a bunch of dry oakum.

He struck a match, and lighted it.

The dry stuff blazed rapidly. The flames crept along, lighting a pile of tarred ropes; then further yet, until the whole run was in a blaze.

Boker sat with arms folded and head bowed. The place was full of smoke; already he was nearly suffocated. The heat of the flames was oppressive. All round him they crackled and roared. He fell forward, gasping as they encircued him.

"FIRE! FIRE! FIRE!" now rung on deck. A snile of exultation lighted the tace of the dying man.

That was his last smile.

With a crash, the timbers above his Lead fell in red rule upon him.

In her apartment, where, until now, she had been too ingrestles by to and fro, Mary Clare heard that fearful cry, we is saw a broad flash of light streaming before her eyes. She spring up, hastly dressing herself, and endeavored to takeck her door. In her haste, she bent the key, so that it was useless.

Meanwhile the flames were roaring and crackling louder, every moment.

"Mary! Mary!" came her father's voice. "My child!"

All was uprour and confusion without; her father's voice was soon drowned in the din.

She pushed at the door, with all her might, yet it would not give way, beteath her tiny strength.

Her apartment we show tall of smoke. Above the cracks in the door, sho could see long, slender columns of flame, treeping in; she knew, by the rotating noise, that the fire was right at her door.

" Break it open," cried a number of voices.

"Impossible," answered another, "we can not get through the fire."

Mary sunk, half fainting from terror, against her berth.

She could now again hear the agonizing cries of her parent, calling upon the mon without to save her.

Wet canvas was being thrown upon the flames to give the men a chance to get at the door.

Vann, however, such efforts, Mary's marte out being rearly over the buboard side of the run, the fire had burst through the planking outside her door, before it was discovered.

Now it was reging all through the cabin, driving the men back, every time they approached the red torrent.

Soon a fearful cry was heard:

"THE POWDER-MAGAZINE!"

The fire was near it; it must explode in a few minutes, and blow up the cutter. Captain Watson issued several basey orders. Wet curves was thrown over the power, and some of the men were pouring a stream of water upon it with a hose, when a long tongue of flune was seen to approach within a foot of it.

"To THE BOATS!—ALL HANDS!" screame I Watson. The boats bad already been lowered.

Into them the man proceeded to descend, since of them draging after them Mr. Clue, who had said that, if his dragater most perish, he would perish with her.

The hoas were not large chongh to hold all the men; so some of them plunged into the water, swimming for the boots of the frigate, which, by this time, were coming to their asnistance. Meanwhile Tom Bend, the Cape Cod man, coolly disober ing orders, had slung himself over the quarter by a staging and, with a huge ax, was endeavoring to force open the planking, hoping in this way to afford an exit for Mary Clare.

The strength this man exerted was tremendous. The pendero is ax swept the air with light hing rapidity, and at every blow, did good work. The plan hight have succeeded mirebly, but for the powder magazine.

By the time the lowered loads were twenty fathoms from the cutter, and Bend was anticipating success with a few more blows, the fire struck the magazine. The wetting of the powder and the canvas upon it deadened the explosion.

As it was, however, it was terrific enough to appal the stoutest heart.

The whole forward part of the cutter was ripped up, and some of the planks and timbers sent flying many feet in the air.

For several moments a thick smoke enveloped the remnants of the vessel; then lurid flames were seen bursting from the black canopy. The foremast went over with a terrific crash, the mainmast followed. The after part of the vessel, which, with the exception of a few timbers, projecting here and there like broken ribs, forward, was the only part of the wreck remaining above the water, was enveloped in a sea of flame.

Tom Bend, though thrown many feet from his position by the shock, and scorched and blackened, was not seriously injured. He struck out and soon reached the mainmast, to which he chang, until he was picked up by the foremost boat from the frigate.

"Where is ske, Bend?" inquired a quick, eager voice, and I all z up, the man beheld Wand, no longer * prisoner, standing upright in the bow of the boat.

"So is where no one can belp her now," answered Bend, in the cabin,"

Wan I instantly divested himself of his coat and shoes.

The officer of the beat remonstrated, but the young man was not to be deterred from his purpose. He plunged over, ran along the mainmast, and was, a moment later, lost to the view in the rolling canopy of smoke.

Meanwhile, almost dead with terror, Mary Clare had aunk down on her knees, to the floor of her room, grassing the side of her berth.

The shock of the explosion had thrown her violently to one side; she had risen to see the apartment full of flames, now bursing in on every side. The heat almost sufficient ideal. Gazing round her upon the hissing, rearing fire-califon, size gave herself up as lost.

This part of the vessel had now keeled over, so that the water also entered the room through small openings in the Ly Bend's ax. But for these openings the poor girl must soon have perished.

Saldenly the blows of the ax, which she had previously heard, were renewed. Timbers and planks soon gave way, and a nimble form crawled into this fiery oven.

It was Captain Wand!

There was no time to lose. The water, routing and gurgling, was already bursting into the lower opinings made; in a few minutes the apartment must be overflowed.

The young girl, tottering forward, fell half frinting into the arms of her lover, gasping out his name. He caught her tightly round the waist, and with his burden, plunged into the sea, to be picked up by the frightly boats.

A minute later, down went all that remained of the cutter; a few fiery timbers, with hissing, gargling sound, disa; pearing in the sea!

CHAPTER XY.

CONCLUSION.

Ir was the night following the destruction of the cutter; a dark night, the moon hidden by heavy clouds.

A small boat left the frigute, containing one man. This per-

He worked the boat to the foot of the conical rocks with a pair of paddles. Below him there was another boat—a skiff, which a man, muffled in a cloak, and wearing a mask, had just left, making his way up one of the steep cliffs. In a few minutes Bend guided his boat to the same spot, and commenced ascending the accivity, keeping his gaze upon the outline of the other person's figure, dimly visible in the gleom.

As he moved on, a couple of large boats, manned by men-

6'-war's-men, also arrive I on the best of the precipice.

Saldenly a hollow, rumbling sound was heard, and tongues of barid flame were seen issuing from one of the conical peaks. A couple of men left the frigate's larger boar, and steadily mounted the cliff, until near the summit, when they peeted down through a large crevice near the opening, whence issued the flames.

"Bend was right," said the voice of one of the persons;

" do you see?"

"Ay, ay," answered the other; "a cunning contrivance to keep vessels away so as to avoid detection."

In fact, these people saw half a dozen men, with muskets, away down under the claff, in the rocky vestibule which had led to the smugglers' retreat.

These men, stending by a large fire, which they had kindled with old pieces of terred rizging, and fed with timber and other material, would occasionally load their muskets and discharge them, producing that rattling, rumbling sound, which had been heard—made to resemble the noise of a a volcano. Meanwhile the flumes ascending, rose many feet above the opening, one of the men augmenting their effect by now and then pouring oil upon them.

"I could have sworn, had I seen this from the sea, that it was a born file volcano, and should, therefore, have given this case a wide both. It is to frighten our frighte away that there's fillows, like imps of darkness, at work in infernal regions, are thus busying themselves."

So sayion, the speaker whispered a few words to his companion, when both descended the chiff. A few minutes after, a strong puty of armed men-o'-war's-men were stationed near the burning opening.

Meanwhile, Bend st.ll continued to follow the dim figure ahead of him.

Soon the figure crawled into an opening among the rocks, concealed by shrubbery.

On he went until he arrived at a large rocky hall, nearly of the same dimensions as the other smuggler retreat, and which was lighted by a lamp stuck in a rocky niche. A piece of blackened canvas, hung over the opening leading to it, h. I this light.

As the cloaked figure entered, about a hundred men si this an I reclining on rough mats, in this retreat, sprung up, dr.wi. q pistols, and cutlasses, with which they were armed.

On recognizing the new-comer, however, which they seemed to do at once, they resumed their sears, while one among them. Captain Malo, advanced.

To and fro the two walked, engaged in earnest conversa-

"Nothing would be easier," said Captain Ma'o, as they finally came to a halt near the piece of tarred canvas, belind which Tom Bend was, by this time, stationed, "and as true as I am a living man, as soon as to deed is dene, you shall get the money—half the sum I have been years in obtaining."

"Ay, but think of the risk," sai i the other, lowering his voice—"it would be next to impossible for me to set the frigate on fire without detection. To tell the truth, I would not like to do it, either, not even for the sum you propose. I have hitherto winked at your proceedings, and endeavored thus to keep you along, but I can not go so far as to set an American frigate on fire."

"Be it so," answered the other, angrily— "from this moment I would dissolve all connections with you, only—"

"You know I could tell tales!" interrupted the other, largh-

"Do you threaten?" inquired Malo, frowning and hying a hand on the pistol in his belt.

"Nay, I have no intention of betraying you, since you could retaliate on me. We have sworn to help each other, and let us continue as hitherto. Only do not ask me to go so far as to fire the frigate."

For full an hour longer the twain conversed; then Wilkins departed.

As he passed through the outer opening of the cave, a man sprung upon him, collaring him and pointing a pistol at his head.

" You are my prisoner!"

The speaker was Tom Bend.

"And what for?" queried Wilkins, speaking in a different

He was evidently much agitated-trendling in every limb.

It is uscless; you are trapped," said Bend, dashing the trusk from the fellow's face. "I know you, Captain Walson—a traiter to your Government!"

Even as he spoke, a number of lanterns gleamed. All 10 nd them, the rocks were alive with men-o'-war's-men from the frigate.

Watson turned white; seen in the glare of the lantern, his face was livid, as the men closed round him.

"And who are you?" he faltered, "that dare accuse me of treason; I, who routed the smugglers from their retreat—who—"

"You are a cumning rascal," interrupted Bend. "Your attack upon the smurglers in their retreat was a feigned one, that you might have the appearance of being zealous in the performance of your duty, and win the good opinion of Mary Clare and her father, by seeming to re one the girl from the subgrees' hands. In this you deceived even your own men and officers, who had no su picion of the double part you were playing. Before making the whole you wanted the smurgler captain, so that he had every this gready to leave, the moment your men should pour through the opening!"

" How know you this?" garped Watson.

The other pulled from beneath his Guernsey, the book he

1. I of tained, after Watson had thrown it overboard.

This contains all the necessary information, with a copy of your note to Malo, a night or two before the attack. The entry her was very methodical in all his dealings!"

At sight of the book Watson storted.

Then, so idenly, from his pecket he palled a pistol, aiming it at his own head. Ere he could discharge it, he was in the firm grasp of several men.

" For God's sake, who are you?" he again asked of Bend.

"Jick Province, concerning called Mad Jack, at your service," unswered the other, coolly.

Watson drew back with a cry of surprise. He had often heard of this celebrated personage among naval men, but had never hitherto seen him, as the two had always been employed on different stations.

"Ay," answered Mad Jack, "I had a roving commission, and, having heard from the Secretary of the Navy, that some one of the United States naval officers must wink at the snapped glers' business, otherwise the outlaws would not succeed so well. I shipped as foremast-hand aboard Captain Waral's vessel, being in a certain secret, connected with that craft. But enough of this; now is our time, hads!"

A moment later a hundred and fifty men burst in upon the smurglers, led by Mad Jack, some of the frigate's officers and Captain Wand.

Thus surprised, the outlaws made but feeble resistance, and were soon overpowered.

They were all conveyed, under a strong guard, to the frigate, to be confined in the vessel's hold.

Meanwhile, Mary Clare, who had been made ill by her recent excitement, reclined in the berth of the apartment which had been assigned her by the frigate's common let. Her father sat by her side, clasping her hand, and codeavering to soothe her, as with burning check and feverishly-glowing eyes, she mattered incoherently on different subjects, in which she frequently mentioned the name of Captain Wan I.

The doctor aboard the frigate had forbid len all excitement, as she was delirious and there was danger of severe brain-fever

Suddenly the poor girl started up, her eyes gleaning wildly upon her parent.

" Oh, papa! they are killing him! killing him for treason.

He is dying, now!"

Just then there was a knock at the door, which being queel, admitted the doctor, who, having felt of the patient's pulse, administered an opiate.

"How now?" inquired Mr. Clare, in a whisper; "is she better?"

"There is a decided improvement," was the answer; " a hattle sleep will make her still bette"

"Will it not be safe—will it not, in fact, do her good, to explain about Wand, when she wakes?"

No, sir, not yet. The excitement would be too much, esspecially as she would only partly understand you in the present state of her mind."

Seon after, Mary fell into a deep slumber.

"That is as it should be," said the doctor, as he bent over to hear the patient's breathing.

At about this time Mad Jack was scated in another part of the cabin with the frigate's commander, who was carefully perusing the book, or smuggler's ledger, which the former had obtained.

And where was Captain Wand? He was on the quarter-deck, pacing it, awaiting the reappearance of the doctor.

The moment this worthy came out, he anxiously questioned him as to the state of Mary Clare.

"Don't be impatient, Sir Smuggler," answered the doctor, rabbing his hands. "She is doing as well as can be expected."

The yo ng man, much relieved, descended into the cabin, and was soon closeted with Mad Jack and Captain Knight-the frigate's commander.

Next morning, Mary being much better, Mr. Clare was perneitted to make the explanation he had intended.

The poor girl's first question, when she waked, had been of Captain Wand. Recollections of past events rushing upon her mind, she remembered the young man having rescued her from the burning vessel.

"Mary," sail her father, now making his appearance, "I here that to state which will be pleasant to you-more so, even, than it was to me."

· Oh, papa where is HE-what have they done with him?"

"It is of him that I am about to speak. Instead of being a consigler, as we sept osed, he has been playing a noble part. It seems that Mao, captain of those rascals, went to Wand, some time ago, to tempt him to become a smuzzler—mentioning the large profits, etc. He had first 'sounded' our young man, it seems, with obscure hims, en leavoging to foster the discount which he then filt at his disappointment in not having long promised. That he was in his little do this ly another, we have a was eridied, from a case of limit from the smugglers retreat, and signed by Wakian, all it Watam—the object of the latter being to get Wand out of his way that he might win you for a wife. He adopted this plan, thinking that you would never overlook TREASON, that it would forever destroy your love for the young man."

" Oh, papa!"

or Well, Wand, zealous to serve the Government, received to be influenced by the smurgler's persuasions, and, at a second interview, almost promised to become one of these sea-cut-laws.

"He went to Washington, saw the Secretary of the Navy, and the plan of the 'blue clipper business' was at once devised. In his character as captain of a smuggler craft, Wandhoped to find out the secret of the whole nest of smugglers, and thus 'root' them, as it were, out of the land. The matter was to be kept a secret frem everybody—naval men and all, (a certain John Percival excepted,) until the young man should actually be captured and threatened with a court-nartial, when a scaled packet in his possession would explain matters.

"Wand, however, asked a favor which was granted by the authorities employing him. This was that he might tell you the secret as soon as he could make you his wife, but not before. Hence his burry, which so astonished as all, on a certain night, to wed his bride."

"Oh, papa, if you had only known! It was crack of the Government not to let him tell us, at once."

your character, it was probably afraid that you might tell tales. In case of marriage, Wand was to take you with him, so that this danger would be prevented. A woman's to give "

"Never mind about that, papa; the Government ought to whipped for its crucity." And she deached both little nsts.

"Well, my dear child, Wand, without knowing it, had among his crew a celebrity, no less a person than John Percival, or Mad Jack, as he is usually termed. This name being on a sort of roving commission, concluded to amuse him self.

"With the knowledge of the Secretary of the Navy, he shipped in the Blue Clipper, pretending to be a native of Cape Cod, anxious to earn the good wages offered by Wand. He Vas to watch the young man, keenly, and ascertain how well he acted his part, with a view to the former's promotion, in case he withstood the many trying ordeals through which, in his assumed character of smuggler, he would be obliged to best. Well, my dear, I have to state that he has performed his duty well, as, by his daring intrepidity, and perseverance, the smuggler retreat has been discovered, and a book, contain it the secrets and places of rendezvous of other smugglers, has been obtained.

"Through the pretended Cape Cod man, Mal Jack, another discovery has been made; the treason of Captain Watson, who, all the while, it seems, has been in league with the smugglers, thus, for so long a time, enabling them to avoid detection."

"He is a miserable traitor; and I have good reason to susfect that it was through him you were carried to Malo's retreat, that he might seem to rescue you when making his pretended attack on the rendezvous"

So saying, and after Mary had expressed her surprise, Mr Clare rose to go on deck.

" Papa I"

" Well.

"Where is Captain Wand?"

Mr. Clare, smiling, opened the door and called, when the young man appeared.

Not even her father's presence could, on this joyful occasion,

Prevent Mary from flying to her lover's arms.

"You will never leave me again?" she said, gently, when the greeting was over.

" No, you shall accompany me on all my cruises," answered the young man.

Mary blashed deeply. Joyful as a bird, she rapidly recovered ber health and spirita

CHAPTER XVI.

THE CLIPPER'S PERIL.

CAPTAIN WAND, with a party of men, went aboard the blue elipper, which was soon repaired so that she was ready for sailing.

Three days after the events described, the young captain came to bid Mary adieu for the present. The prisoners had been transferred to the hold of the clipper, to be conveyed at once to New Orleans, as the frigate was under orders to remain awhile at Vera Cruz.

When Wand held out his hand to Miss Clare, she turned pale and trembled.

"It is only for a short time," said the young captain; "we will meet again at New Orleans."

"I know not why," she faltered, "but I feel strangely about this—as if something evil would happen; as if—'here tears came to her eyes—"I shall never see you again. Papa," she added, addressing her father, who was not far off—"why can not we go in the clipper with Mr. Wan 1?"

The old gentleman's eyes twinkled.

"So you can not bear to be separated from Lim, even for a few weeks. I can wind up my business at Vera Cruz, where you know I have an agent, in a short time. I would like to see him about some casks of surar, an !—"

Mary, posting, held up her hand.

"Let your surar co, dear papa," sail she. "I think we had

Mr. Chare allowed himself to be persualed.

Wand, delighted, gave Mary a grateful glance.

The three were soon about the elipper, which, with a fair wind, went bowling seaward, Wand politely retaining a parting salute fired from some of the frigate's gans.

The vessel made good headway on the first day, but, on the second, head-win is sprung up and knocked her considerably of her course.

Wand did not like the looks of the sky nor of the sun.

The latter was of a dusky hue, with a greenish ring around it, and a strange red-looking vapor partially obscuring it.

"What do you think, sir?" the young captain inquired of Mad Jack, who now accompanied him as a passenger.

Percival seized a spy-glass, and leveled it skyward.

"(foing to have a screamer, sir!" he said, his eyes alight with a peculiar gleam—" never saw the sun look that way but once before, and that was when, years ago, I was cast away, here in the gulf, and for three days clung to the bottom of a boat!"

Mary now turned pale, and shrunk closely to Wand's side.

In spite of her terror, however, one could plainly see that the strong, confident natures of such men as Percival and Wand inspired her with a feeling of security.

A strange, humoling sound was now heard, through the air above their heads, as if some hollow instrument were being sounded by hosts of invisible beings.

The vapor over the sun semed to go round and round; the planet was of a blood red by:

Suddenly a peculiar, thin-looking haze was seen flying along toward the schooner from windward. Beneath it the water was lashed to a foam, and the spray flow up in long, regred columns, thus showing the violence of the gale in that quarter.

" Here it comes !" cried Percival.

"Hands by the hallinds! hewled Wand.

In a few minutes the little schooner was surging along un der close-reefed forctop sail and topmast staysails.

I st then there was a sound like a clop of thunder. The whole heavens, by this time obscured by a dense, black, vapor like sucke, were lighted by a buril of ann, which lasted for excel minutes. In this weird, the the lare, the occur present la singular aspect. Little points of the flame were seen runing along the waves, up the schooler's siles and her such its and masts, while the faces of the scamen, receiving the strange glow, looked livid. —

"God help us!" graped Mary.

Want squeezed her hand, reassuringly, and advice her to go below.

the went into the companion-way, but remained on the lan ling of the staircase, peering through the opening in the door, now closed to keep out the coming spray.

The electric gleam mentioned had now passed-darkness, almost like that of night, closed round the schooner.

A roar, as if an army of sea-lions were approaching, made every timber in the little vessel shake.

The white water came rapidly down from win lwar 1--there was a howl—a shrick—a weird screaming, and the blood per was caught in one of the most terribe gales that ever plowed up the gulf. Down she went—the gallant little craft—upon her beam-ends, and then, with a load report, away she flew like a bolt shot from a gun!

Tearing through the mad waves, her bows were ingulfed in the caliron of hissing, boiling waters, the spray enveloped her as if in a shroud, and flew to the very tops of her swaying, cracking masts.

A long, continuous hollow hamming was Leard through the din of rouring seas and creaking timbers.

"Min! yourself at that wheel!" screame! Wan! to an o'll ter, who, in dripping jacket and sou'wester, guild the little schooner.

. " Ay, ay, sir !"

The seas were now making mad music all over the vessel F re and aft they swept her decks, crashing, rearing a way a portion of the galley, the warelshors, and the weather bulwarks.

A sound like the report of a cannon was such hard, as the hatches of the main hold, which had been exactedly hatched down, were ripped open, and sent flying has the count.

Through the opening the water pourch like a catality is the prisoners below, whose cries of tener weat up a list the fin of the storm. They must all have been do with a little schooner waterlogged, but for the prompt with a of Mail I all and Wand, who, seizing tarpaulins, reshed and little and with the help of the sallors, soon secured the car was over the har an Nevertheless, from the great quantitly of water which had already entered the hold, the situation of the pris ners was still both uncomfortable and perilous. Thrown away to leeward, they were huddled, like sheep, almost on the top of each other.

Common Lumanity urging Wand to relieve them, he ordered tome of the sailors to knock away part of the planking separating the main from the fere-hold, that the prisoners might have a larger space to themselves.

By this time, the violence of the storm having abate I, the fail as were enable I to easily accomplish their task. Having the ness they were hurrying to the deck to fasten the hatches it an over the fore-hold, when some of the prisoners, who, I ving to a scant supply of irons aboard the frigate, had not been han leuffel, threw themselves upon the men, hauled them back into the hold, and beg in a furious assault upon them.

"That's it, my lasis!" screamed Watson, who, heavily ironed, at in the after part of the hold. "Give it to them! Kill the raseds, and we will take the clipper!"

At this all the prisoners cheered like fiends.

The clipper's men, foriously assailed on all sides, and vainly endeavering to defend themselves, were knocked down, stunned and braisel—some of them almost killed.

Wand and Mad Jack, hearing the noise, had not time to advance three steps when the cof the prioners who were not

Land and it thirty was in all, sprung on deck.

"Blacken!" exclaimed Percivel, "they should have been to blue seep, as I advised, when the frigate's captain tobleme be had not irons enough for all."

"The twoodd have been twelves, as they would have contribed to be en flatronts!" said Wand.

While spedding the two men has not been 1 Se.

They is I summe not round them such of the crew—twenty in all— were on deck, nineteen men being aloft, shaking a loof of the from all. These twenty men were quickly it is a with curleton, and beaded by Wand, who was about it can to drive the chaped prisoners back into the hold, and the larger larger and are of the gams forward, an old in a larger larger will have the same of the gams forward, an old in a larger larger will have the same of the gams forward, an old in a larger larger will have the same of the gams forward, an old in a larger larger ward, which is a larger larger ward.

"Fire." show of the smuz_lers-a tall fellow, wearing a blue cap and black shirt.

The gun thundered.

Ward had held his men to one side, but not in time for all to cause the deadly discharge.

Three poor fellows bounded up screaming, then fell dead, their bodies rolling into the lee scuppers.

" Hooray! hooray!" yelled the smugglers.

Those below answering with shricks, the schooner seemed turned into a Pandemonium.

Meanwhile the men aloft were now descending to help their shipmates.

Their foes perceiving this, one of them caught up an ax lining near the cook-house, and commenced cutting away the loremast.

"Now, men!" cried Wand to his party—"now is our time!" With a cheer, the band advanced.

At that moment there was a crash, as the half-severed foremast went over, the gale having assisted the man with the ax-

The shrouds and stays having only partially given way, the mast hung across the shattered bulwarks, and behind this the smugglers now took their station.

The poor fellows who had been aloft were seen clinging to that part of the most hanging in the sea.

The schooner's peril was now twofeld. Menaced with capture by the smuzzlers, and with a struction by the storm, she lay half buried in the rearing seas.

The shringglers posted on the forceastle deck, were est of the water, but their assailants were nearly up to their waiss in it, and were obliged now and then to held on her it o save themselves from being washed overheard.

Provided with head pikes and crowbers the mutiness could therefore easily keep the attacking party at but.

Sublenly a fearful cry went three. In the self-per.

"LAND 'O ! RIGHT AHEAD!"

There, sure enough, booming up through the symmetrics. were the rocks off the coast of Yucater, the schooler having been driven in this direction by the gala.

There was no time to loc. Something must be done, and that speedily.

Percival was the man for the hour. While Wand was forcing a passage toward the snanghers through targled ripes and through cataracts of water, he dant don the exist of the schooler, and running along to the force ins, solicity bounded over the heads of his foes upon the forecastle lack!

Ere they could turn upon him, he had the swivel--a nine-pounder-pointed toward them.

"Back, every man of you!" he thundered, "or I will blow

I'm all to perdition!"

He knew the gun was not loaded—knew also that the smugflers were unacquainted with this fact.

They drew back shrinking; the fiery glauce of Mallack following every movement.

" Back into the hold!" continued Percival.

The smugglers, however, instead of obeying, sprung upon the wreck of the foremast, intending to get to the other side of it, where they would be out of range of the swivel.

Wand, however, had now reached this point, and, although sill unable, owing to the cataracts of water rushing over the schooner, to get upon the spar, he was ready to cut down the first man of the smugglers who should spring to the deck.

A portion of his party were, meanwhile, endeavoring to help about the men clinging to the mast outside of the vessel.

These poor fellows were indeed in a perilous situation, their trus a thing so from their protracted hold, that they must soon by go, unless assisted.

Ryes, with bowline hitches being thrown to them, they Were finally drawn safely to the schooner.

The latter was now alarmingly near the rocks, frowning like bin it rangeres, right about.

"Hill on, hads!" screamed one of the smugglers—" if we can't take the vessel, we can be the means of her going to Davy Jones! That swivel can't hit us all!"

This was true. The shorrlers having ringed themselves in a line on the spar, could not all be struck by the shot from the

E III.

In this critical state of affairs Wand conceived an idea, which leat once put in execution.

Size of the av with which one of his enemies had cut down the formast, he wasted to starboard through the water, and switch as if upon that part of the spar by the stump.

The number of the him were a ivalent toward him with the number of the number of him with the number of him to have a list as on high, he held it also the main to have the number of the mast from going by the interpreted the mast from going to the relation of the number of the numb

"Into the hold!" he thundered, "or by heaven, I will as you all adrift with one blow of this ar."

The smugglers stood appalled. On one side of them the swivel—on the other the men with cutless, this real by their saved shipmates ready to cut then down if they spring to the deck—on the other Wand, ax in hand, prepared to sweet the stay, and thus set them adrift!

There was no help for it—they were belled, and with a lowl of disappointment, they plunged into the fercheld, over which some of the sailors, after hoisting up their hij and shipmates, secured the hatches.

The plan of the smugglers thus defeated, Wandnew, assisted by Percival, exerted himself to save the school for first pring on the rocks, toward which she was driftle with frightful rapidity.

The foremast having gone, there was door of the main soon going also.

In fact the wrecked mast had scarely be need with the schooner thus cleared of a most sowed and in the school with a crash, over went the reason.

Ax in hand, Percival, quick as little in the little part of the part, when there was the hull of the little part of the little

Driven straight toward the recks, it somethed if the increase reaches the property of the unfortunate vessel and the property of the increase we have the property of the prop

Both anchors, however, were cleared to the had hauled around a little to the care to the little to the target of the both the would hold.

The right and left bower were both him. . . . ! . WIT WAS and Wand.

On went the wreck toward the relies to the latter were now not more than to find the start of the latter were now not more than to find the start of the latter were now not more than to find the start of the latter were now not more than to find the start of the latter were now not more than to find the start of the latter were now not more than to find the start of the latter were now not more than to find the start of the latter were now not more than to find the start of the latter were now not more than to find the start of the latter were now not more than to find the start of the latter were now not more than to find the start of the latter were now not more than to find the start of the latter were now not more than to find the start of the latter were now not more than to find the start of the latter were now not more than to find the start of the latter were now not more than to find the start of the latter were now not more than to find the start of the latter were now not more than to find the start of the latter were now not more than the start of the latter were now not more t

On went the wreck.

" She will strike!" sail War !, ' ; '

Just then there was a jerk—the had well a walling the fathoms of the rocks, and there remained state harry.

other's hands.

wand resolved to remain here until the storm should abate and he could rig new masts.

The state of the large, so that there was now not the lightest danger of the hull's dragging.

The result of Wand, with his boats, turned the wreek for principles for getting up new masts were now made in the result of spare spars aboard, so that the well product of spare spars aboard, so that we will be a largely. In about a fortnight the spars were right to a largely sand sails adjusted.

were to sail, "our troubles are now over."

"I begin a ." be easy red. "With the fair wind we now begin with the ch New Orleans in a few days."

" Why not sail to-night?"

"The is a little work yet to be done aboft. It will be all finished by eight o'clock to-morrow."

the born we all the deck for some time, enjoying the teal. It, which and this night, made objects seem almost as clear as in the daytime.

After Mary had gover below, Wand walked forward to see that every thing was there as it should be. He was about returning aft, when he heard a voice in the hold:

"Captain! I am nearly stifled!"

"Who is that?" he exclaimed.

"M"—("main Mala," was answered. "For God's sake let a little fresh air! I am sick and dizzy!"

Common humanity urged Wand to comply, and Malo was soon on deck.

Continent and grief to I made a strange afteration in his and and all of the free, formerly so dark and ruddy, was now so, want his rear his eyes sunken, and his cheek-bones protein in his hands were free, but a ball and chain were about his mides, so that as he now paced the deck, they kept up a dismal clanking.

"You are a shrewd fellow, Captain Wand," said he, " and I acknowledge that the capture of myself and land was most cunningly contrived."

"I did my duty," Wand Friefly replied.

"You did more," said Malo, in a hollow wice. "You were the means of my losing my Nettle-my lealing childent the pride of her father! The poor thing loved you—hore the fool she, as you did not care a straw for her."

"I am very sorry," said Wand—"I never gave her the less encouragement. I can feel for you in the less of one you loved so well."

You are a hypocrite! cried Malo, thereby—"wall what you say is false. You have not given the matter a in a mile thought. By heaven! you ought not to live to crow ever to and mine! over my capture, and the fact of my decide ris lowing you."

"A man were indeed a dastard to crow over a faller for and worse yet over the love of a weman whose love by his is unrequited. No, Captain Male, you are rist dentifyed think I could do that, although I a move love I can give if my success in the path of days!"

"You shall not live to boast of that saless"

With these words he turn I suit dy you Wind, who was wholey unprepared, caught him by the thrust with one hard, and pulling his sword from the year made but, down has the weapon to plange it into its owner's bety.

Wan I was a brave men, but so sall but was the assail, the for a moment a shudder pessed over him.

In another instant the we pen has have han drived through idea, had not the prisoners will have hand not the prisoners will have hand in the sword state half as had had.

"Back into the hold!" he now erid, paraller Male and an I returning Wan I his swort.

The smitgler gritted his teeth.

"It will be a pleasure to me," continue? Percival, "to see such a rascal hanged!"

" You will never have that pleasure," answered Malo.

With these words, he that I himself over the schooner's rail to the sea! Percival and Wand both rashed to the rail, and glared over, but day never saw Malo a din.

His had been dragged down like a shot by the weight of the ball and chain, a few ball is rising to the strike showing in a twint late. La noch was

A but was into the lower land a skillful Perter of aver was set down, in the hope that Malo might be said are life was entirely extinct.

The diver remained under water as long as possible, so that when he came to the surface, some seconds chapsed are he could regain his breath.

He then stated that the chain had got entangled in a sunken spin of rock, so that he had found it impossible to dislodge the body.

We will have it where it is, then," said Percival, " as he must have perished ere this."

They returned about to see the decks crowded with sailors, all f whom, by this time, had beard of what had happened.

D th Mary and her father, who had also been disturbed, were on the quarter-deck.

"A fitting doom for a smuggier," said Mr. Clare.

"Ay, ay," answered Perciva".

Then Ward related his narrow escape.

Mary shaddered, and half unconsciously encircled him with Taen, thishing at what she had done, she drew back.

"We will have him out of all danger, before long, now," sail Preival. "So cheer up, Mrs Clure!"

They remained conversing on deck for several hours,

There was little sleep for Mary that hight, thinking of her lever's late peril.

In the morning preparations for saining were at a appleted by ten o'clock.

Son after the vessel went bowling upon her northward course, and the cheers of all hands, with the stars and stripes of her mission.

a few more words.

The Blue Clipper, arriving at New Orleans, was remodeled, and fitted into a gallant little of the them. a. I of which was given to Wand, who and the little captain for his valuable services, so that the thin the sweet Mary Clare.

The captured smugglers were dealt with a second of the Captain Watson committed sold in which the second of the second was being held. Subsequently the which the control of the second clark which the second of the second were now elling a training of the sealing, and thus forever was destroyed the Lagre of the second were Cask.

STANDARD DIME DIALOGUES For School Exhibitions and Home Entertainments. Fe. 1 to 21 mel 14.ve. 15 to 5 P p for Ired give and Dramas in each book. Each rolume 100 12 to 1 gen, sent ; at pa 2, on rouspi of price, ten cente.

Boadle & Adams, Publishers, 93 William St., N. Y.

there are a many have been present wit estacial reference to their availability for Exh hitlory. the second and the second to the second the furniture of a stage and contect to be Herly s v. , You ve the of every age, buttt male and female. It is le's to recurse that ne by a to a sever, at one price, contain so many useful and avaliance dialogues and grames et. 10, hamor and sentiment.

DIME DIALOGUES, NO. 1.

4 . 2 When Pernish young make. we are the second to the first reversion to two lates. Francisco Francisco Francisco w su(, -1 hrtwobevs. The file. Frtw . . 10 g Table

I all a settle borter a few

I whose of the rets. I symposites.

He bin bing. For five speakers. The Secret of Success For Lives speakers. Young America. Tures males and two famales. Just ... no's Pestinv. Four females, onen ag The Folly of the Duel. For three male apantors Dogmatiam. For three male speakers. The Imporant Confounded. For two boyer The Fast Young Man. For two males. for some of the of Land Male and female. The Year's Recasting. It females and I main by a very transfer of the Court males and one mile.

DIME DIALOGUES, NO. 3.

The last to f I harry, 2 ma as and I famale. for all the last of the ter. if and and the organistic bearing the service of th Two men Hayar, The trains or 1 (we) to week ים ביותר ביו Tax no set Dan Fir. Firtwo chara turn. The to try 4 min Vis t to the City, her sev. The Little ", is sophers. For two little girling era! characters.

To ta lamana. Frim hairs. I've count to the lets. I've term to mines. for the bar. Freenes, two alles The Romander & it be retained at a 1 to.

How to Wi a Fapular 'Stories Take amount Inc News I the Old For two mains The tyreen jorn. For two ms'es, I tree You of Science. For four makely The Old L. iv's Will. For four mates, How to Find on Heir. For five males, I to Virtne . For six young ladies. A Corpt at Relegue. Fire Pub conesting. Five males and one females I e hages. Traveler, For two mess.

DIME DIALOGUES, NO. 3.

The Gentee, Cook. For two males. I A F. . Friter ales, Inc Two Remans. For two mates. Catronal Representatives. A Burlesque. 4 maire. wing the White Feather. 6 males, 1 females To a glodate british and

In hatte bil. A Recitative, For one mate,

DIME DIALOGUES, NO. 4. To find I'my. For ten or info remone. 1 '7. A . SC . S To I f ' The Letter Do. two makes

For ten or the termine. The htubbletown Volunteer. I males, I for ale Tre of Jan Fried to a serve of the Creak and Besons. For three little girls. Forth A Fig. Y. Fire x tiegral a light ray. A Colloquy. Fortwo toye. The Commercial Dress. A Colleger. Fr a difference of 2 nevolences For it makes

DIME DIALOGUES, 1 7. 5. . Toma Carena, For all Toppele. at the American Transfer to the re-TO a miles yet or a specific was to the same to be the same to the comand a Day For several female characters. Mattry-hi mer. As Acting Character. I'm hope in "Theme " Engagement males, The second of the second of the the second second second

Physics on and A Collocory The Street Mary Party or St. I'we ideas it tale. A Co. toquy. I'w at 1.h I rerect f m . isrino Factoro. The x ! . doe. For alx young ladies. To les use at Home. For two maics. has been a Requirements. For three ciral. A isevy I I's (Eyes). For eight or less littale 12 le

DIALOGUS, NO. 6. The Van Dong Kept a Serget Will and ferrales Best under Difficulties. Fribe in Frankling. 17 manie Marta Sevento, i resultant also and the state of the second of the second or the tomation of the Nice and females . Fo Contierous Jow. P or six con as.

tenouse. For tures males and one female.

"- The Connectors. For there makes. The Totaries of Polig. For a number of females Ann' lietsy's Beans. Four fecoules and two manes The sibel Suit. For two famales and one same varie clare. For a number of boys. The Tures Lings for the main Dime School Series-Dialogues.

DIME DIALOGUES, No. 20.

The wrong man. Three makes and three females | Au air castle. Fir tive makes and times females. At the weare. I'm ind in o gifte. Ned's present. For four boys. J to the fortes or an isomeral scholars. To remain to the return to was Serit, love. For two boxa-Marien or a livernament three femare Contract the first tor 3 mere sand I comover A cure to general Commence to a first to the commence of the comm A " total car to the Haraber of these 16 Sold." For three boys.

C.1. municipers and Country bearing For torse of the and one boy. The array ray ie. Friwage's and teather. Not one tunto to first or now to fin Foot-print. For numerous character . he ares. In contracted their district wo waste. For the wards mossful bratton party. Far several. of feet at of dunger. For turge made Page Forty B. I willed it. ing Hool. Fr two coldren. H w she made him prop w. A duck, I to a rate of tara. I. Erfourfe malos. f. clonce one g . hir two miles. Worth and wealth. For sour females. Waterfull. For several,

DIME DIALOGUES, No. 21.

Mara Heat ups in the For Far maio and that the a. Part a factor. Francis (A.) Maria I receive Without we directores a tel A sudden recovery. For three males. the sure confinite to the s. .. Crist of the tent before they work For four males.

DIME DIALOGUES, No. 22.

The Dark Curial, or, the mistakes of a morning. Determine ban suct. If ra number of gria. har three consumer and two league Boyen is too buy buy Fram bus ar since eth I' at No'er dewe it or, a brother's lesson. For Army lev. or, the blood of the photophers. two males and two fa nales. For three young Hennet ortuene une bertwogirts. the tie to my brate a feet are. for the live tire. Eriscobys. The wat to that the late of the wat to be water The King of a sport. For four grows Fit the the sections of the te & deliver A prest aberer, dest. to Dortwo bors. W .M. Il is ear i as a is A ner A, or, Vances vs. The little do tor. I rive to a grant Frenchman. For four boys, A sweet revenge. But four boys. Dx. s tolerice. Blessies art fordentals. A Mariney, fortime teers. A brancoman; or, the onewasted annual for two first there are the rethe as and one gentle can. plants to the e. I rivet to

DIME DIALOGUES, No. 23.

Plana Hart's rome fr. For 3 fe ales, 1 male. Hars be an it's recommend. For two males. Cherralter able. Fortwolt le hora Termination trackfrombas. Ilves t past ber a x miles. Cara statement and a me amportaneous. two is es, two ferre es and two chi, fren. Tradden. From at above. If for seath Mr. Stower for I made, 6 females. Interested as parties. Persented mases. I to read Cost. For two gris.

A hear garden. I rit recomment two ferrales. The busy bees. For four I tale Cher to be I P SHAFF AND CONT. Southerne, Friend Legis the seem to the section and a process For Dr. small gold. hevers, translets, tressand for 12120 Continued M 'er Forthree males, two formales l'e sur's a l. I - four letterace.

DIME DIALOGUES, No. 24.

Tingelloss of Charter, First on the states. | Terx recent. For six both I at resign, on, it recens but any lit-I m in teret, he we en times. A stra re o cret. Fr a se ris. An unjust man. For some malan. experientes laste 3 forda to the total of a fine on a fine of the first at a west to be tage when I of A to er for start a, in th seren. from the her conduction to the transfer to Hase tons got of che mewalt The trace of early Two waters with the A . 1 . Harry & Branch, 1 2: 2 1 9" " " orn! auxitiaries. I see the second of the form. The state of the state of That rest from 1 / he was a few a second All or to see out a fast to the a as the same and a second of a

DIME DIALOGUES, No. 25.

, you can be a of the delication or at two amounts and crive and the party of Printer to be building to be the state of th to the transfer to be for a finished a . I make the contract to the terms of was to better the value It have the state and four furnales. " ware fine ; without I me seed on anacters Solwels, Fraustrar of mis. 4 from the for a war or it the gra.

Trettains 'was, the France, for the transfer "and wife bree breek a I was and a second congre Tree tot a large to for them 2 to the first I court the real a a comments A director. HE WAS " THE . W TOWNER . in Two in 1 And one generalization

The above hasks are a 's by Newsdenlers everywhere, or will be some postage the trace, sa reserve of price, le cente en h.

AMANUAR & ADAMS. Publishers, 90 William Korth, and STANDARD DIME SPEAKERS-50 to 80 Pieces in Each Volume

DIME AMERICAN SPEAKER, No. 1.

Young America, Birthday of Washington A. Ward's oration, Plea for the Maine law, Not on the battlefield, The Italian struggle, Independence, Our country, The equality of man, Character of the Revo'n The fruit and the war, The sawing-machine, to manhood, mystery of life, ipe and dawns, culy great,

Early retiring and ris'g, J. Jeboom's oration, Frae nationality, Our natal day, Solfeeino, Intelligence the basis of An old ballad, Charge of light brigade, Alter the battle, The glass railroad, Case of Mr. Macbeth, Prof. on phrenology, Annabel Lee, Washington's name, I'ue sador boy's syren,

A Dutch cure, The weather, The heated term, Philosophy applied, [liberty, Po my wise, pound fool- A vision in the forest, I'cue cleanliness, Sat'd'y night's enjoy'ts, Woman's rights, 'in a just cause,' No peace with oppres- My ladder, A tale of a mouse, A thanksgiving sermon, The rebellion of 1867 & The cost of riches,

Great lives imperishable The prophecy for the y's Untinished problems, Honor to the dead, Immortality of patriots Webster's polit't system [ish, The press, Might of the Garerned. Wonder, Atons, Distinion,

SPEAKER, No. 2.

Union and its results, Our country's future, The statesman's labors, From tonortality, Let the child less weep, Dur country's glory, Union a household, Independence bell, The scholar's dignity, The eyeles of progress, A Christmas chant, Stability of Christiansty, Three fools, The true higher law, The one great need, The ship and the bird, Teeu mach's speech, l'erritorial expansion, Martin Hopkins, The bashtul man's stery Systems of belief, The matter-of-fact man. Rich and pour, Seeing the eclipse, Beauties of the law, Ge-lang! git up, The rate of file, Creawning glory of U.S. Our country first, last, Washington, Our great inheritance, Eulogy on Lienry Clay, National batreds, Ohio, Oliver Hazard Perry, Our domain, The Indian chief, The independent farmer The bugle, Mrs. Grammar's ball, How the money comes, Future of the f shions, Loyalty to liberty, and always, British influence. Detenne of Jackson, Murder will out, Strive for the oest, Early rising, Deeds of kindness, Gates of sleep, A Hoodish gem. Purity of the struggle. Uld age. Beentiful and true, The worm of the still, Man and the Infinite, Langrage of the Eagle, Washington, The Deluge.

SPEAKER, No. 3.

America to the world, Love of coentry, Right of self-preserva- Christy's speech, Our eansa, A Kentuckian's appeal, Kentucky stradfast, Timidity is treason, The slarum. April 15th, 1561, The spirit of '61, The precious heritage,

The Irish element, Train's speech, Ition, Let me alone, Brigan I-ler General, The draft, Union Square speeches, The Union, Our country's call. The story of an oak tree, Battle anthem, L-e-g on my leg,

History of our flag, T. F. Meagher's address, We owe to the Union, Last speech of Stephen A. Douglas, Lincoln's message, Great Hell Roland, The New Year and the A foreigner's tribute, King Cotton, [Union,

The ends of peace,

Freedom the watchword Crisis of our nation, Duty of Christian po--kriois, Turkey Den's oration, A fearlest plea, The onus of slavery. The little Zounve, Catholic cathedral, The "Speculators."

SPEAKER, No. 4

El-boyergoss on the war Pop. Age blently considered, A Texan Eulogium, Lorly rising, The wrap and the bee, Comic Gram nar, No. I. Puff's ace't of himself, I'm not a single man, h. Ward's advice, Banfun on Pickwick, Romeo and Juliet, Happiness, -58₀

How to be a Breman, The United States, Practical phrenology, Beautiful, Cabbage, +Disagreeable people, Funny folks,

A song of woe, Ward's trip to Richm'd, Comic Grammar, No. 2, Parody, The mountebank, Compound interest, A sermon on the feet, Old dog Jock, The fishes' toilet, Brian O'Linn, What is a bachelor like ! Crockett to office-seekers Lecture on beamotio, Who is my opponent! Mrs. Caudle on Umbr ?~

Political atump speech, Farewell to the bottle, The cork leg, The smack i school, Slick's definition of wife, Tale of a hat, The debating club, A Dutch sermon, ELOCUTIONIST, No. 5.

PRINCIPLES OF TRUE ENUNCIATION. -Faults in sounciation; how to avoid them.

Special rules and observations, POC IL THE ART OF CHATORY .- Sheridan's List of the Passions. Tranquillity, Cheerfulness, Mirth, Raillery, Buffoonery, Joy, Delight, Gravity, Inquiry, Attention, Modesty, Per-Plexity, Pity, Grief, Melancholy, Despair, Fear, Shame, Remorse, Courngs, Boasting, Pride, Obstinacy, Authority, Commanding, Forbidding, Affirming, Dapying, Difference, Agresing, Exhorting, Judging, Approving, Ac-Arguing, Condemning, Teaching, Pardoning, Arguing, Dismissing, Refusing, Granting, De-Pendenze, Veneration, Hope Desire, Love, Reopect, Glaing, Wonder, Admiration, Gratitude, Curton ty, Persuasion, Tempting, Promising, Affectation, Sloth, Interiorition, Anger, etc.

SEC. III. THE COMPONENT ELEMENTS OF A. ORATION. - Rules of Composition as applied to Worns and Phrases, via : Purity, Propriety, Precision. As applied to Sextences, viz.; Length of Sentence, Clearness, Unity, Strength, Figures of Speech; the Exordium, the Narration, the Proposition, the Confirmation, the Refutation, the Peroration.

SEC. IV. REPRESENTATIVE EXERCISES IN PROSE D VERSE -- Transition : A Plea for the Or. Falstaff's Solllequy on Honor; the Burial of Lincoln; the Call and Response; the Bayenes Charge; History of a Life; the Bugle; the Bella; Byron; Macbeth and the Dagger; Hamist's Sollloquy; Old Things; Look Up. ward; King William Rufus; the Eye; Easa onto Musik; Discoveries of Galileo.

AEC. V. CHERRYATIONS OF GOOD AUTHORITIES

DIME DIALECT SPEAKER, No. 23.

Dat's wat's de matter, [All about a bee, The Miss ssippi miracle, Scandal, Ven te tide coums in, Duse lains vot Mary ha! Te pesser vay, got, man's rights, The home rulers, how they "spakes," Hezeklah Dawson on Mothers-in-law, He didn't sell the farm. The true story of Frank lin's kite, I would I were a boy again, A pathetic story,

A dark side view, On learning German, Pat O'Flaherty on wo- Mary's shmall vite lamb A healthy discourse, Polins to speak, Old Mrs. Grimes, parudy, Mars and cate, ill Underwood, pilot, Mid Grantey, Lion, words,

The manifest destiny of Condensed Mythology. the Irishman, Peggy McCann, Sprays from Josh Bil De circumstances ob de A doketor's drubbles, sitiwation, Dar's nuffic new under The illigant affair at A Negro religious poem, That little baby round That violin, Picnic delights, The pill peddler's ora- Our c ndidate's views, Dundreary's wisdom, Vidder Green's last Plain language by truthful Jane,

Latest Chinese outrage, My neighbor's dogs, Pictus, The Nereides, Legends of Attica, The store-plie traredy The coming man, Muldcon's, the curber, A genewine inference, An-invitation to the bird of liberty, The crow, Unit West

DIME DIALOGUES No. 26.

Poor consins. Three ladies and two gentlemen. | The lesson of mercy. Two very small girls. Mountains and mole-hills. Six ladies and several Practice what you preach. Four ladies. a . ectators.

A test that did not fail. Six bovs. Two ways of seeing things. Two little girls. Don't count your chickens before they are Grub. Two males.

hatched. Four ladies and a boy. All is fair in love and war. 3 ladies, 2 gentlemen. Embodi d sunshine. Three young ladies. How uncle Josh got rid of the legacy. Two males, How Jim Peters died. Two males. with several transformations.

Politician. Numerous characters. The canvassing agent. Two males and two females. A slight scare. Three females and one mala.

DIME DIALOGUES No. 27.

Patsey O'Dowd's campaign. For three males | The street girl's good angel. For two ladies and and one female. Hasty inferences not always just. Numerous "That ungrateful little nigger." For two males. Discontented Annie. For several girls. A double surprise. Four males and one female. What was it! For five ladies, What will cure them! For a lady and two boys. Independent. For numerous characters. Each a-uson the best. For four boys. Tried and found wanting. For several males. A boy's plot. For several characters.

The second secon

two little girls. If I had the money. For three little girls. Appearances are deceitful. For several ladies and one gentleman. Love's protest. For two little girls. An enforced cure. For several characters. Those who preach and those who perform. For three males. A gentle conquest. For two young girls.

AND DESCRIPTION OF THE PARTY OF

A CONTRACTOR OF THE PARTY OF

The above books are sold by Newsdealers everywhere, or will be sent, post-paid, to any address, on receipt of price, 10 cents each.

BEADLE & ADAMS, Publishers, 98 William St., N. Y.

STANDARD BOOKS OF GAMES AND PASTIMES

BEADLE AND ADAMS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK.

DIME BASE-BALL PLAYER FOR 1880.

Containing the League and National Club Averages for 1879, together with the Model Games of the season. The prize winners in the National Championship and new chapters on Batting, Fielding, and Base Running. Also, a New Scoring System, with record of the Metropolitan Championship Games and Pacific League Averages. Edited by Henry Chadwick.

HAND-BOOK OF CROQUET.

A Complete Guide to the Principles and Practice of the Game. This popular pastime has, during the few years of its existence, rapidly outgrown the first vague and imperfect rules and regulations of its inventor; and, as almost every house at which it is played adopts a different code of laws, it becomes a difficult matter for a stranger to assimilate his play to that of other people. It is, therefore, highly desirable that one uniform system should be generally adopted, and hence the object of this work is to establish a recognized method of playing the game.

DIME BOOK OF 100 GAMES.

Out-door and in-door SUMMER GAMES for Tourists and Families in the Country, Picnics, etc., comprising 100 Games, Forfeits and Conundrums for Childhood and Youth, Single and Married, Grave and Gay. A Pocket Hand-book for the Summer Season.

CRICKET AND FOOT-BALL.

A desirable Cricketer's Companion, containing complete instructions in the elements of Bowling, Batting and Fielding; also the Revised Laws of the Game; Re marks on the Duties of Umpires; the Mary-le-Bone Cricket Club Rules and Regu lations; Bets, etc. By Henry Chadwick, HAND-BOOK OF PEDESTRIANISM.

Giving the Rules for Training and Practice in Walking, Running, Leaping, Vaulting, etc. Edited by Henry Chadwick.

YACHTING AND ROWING.

This volume will be found very complete as a guide to the conduct of watercraft, and full of interesting information alike to the amateur and the novice. The chapter referring to the great rowing-match of the Oxford and Cambridge clubs on the Thames, will be found particularly interesting.

RIDING AND DRIVING.

A sure guide to correct Horsemanship, with complete directions for the road and field; and a specific section of directions and information for female equestrians. Drawn largely from "Stonehenge's" fine manual, this volume will be found all that can be desired by those seeking to know all about the horse, and his management in harness and under the saddle.

GUIDE TO SWIMMING.

Comprising Advisory Instructions; Rules upon Entering the Water; General Directions for Swimming; Diving: How to Come to the Surface; Swimming on the Back; How to Swim in times of Danger; Surf-bathing-How to Manage the Waves, the Tides, etc.; a Chapter for the Ladies; a Specimen Female Swimming School: How to Manage Cases of Drowning; Dr. Franklin's Code for Swimmers; etc. Hustrated. By Capt. Philip Peterson.

For sale by all newsdealers; or sent, post-paid, to any address, on receipt of price-TEN CENTS each.

BEADLE AND ADAMS, PUBLISHERS, 98 WILLIAM ST., N. Y.

BEADLE'S NEW DIME NOVELS.

322 Old Grizzly. 323 Dashing Dragoons. 324 Will-o'-the Wisp. 325 Dashing Dick. 326 Old Crossfire. 327 Ben Bramble. 328 Brigand Captain. 329 Old Strategy. 330 Gray Hair, Chief. 331 Prairie Tigers. 332 Rival Hunters. 333 Texan Scout. 334 Zebra Zack. 835 Masked Messenger. 336 Morgan, the Pirate. 337 The Boy Spy. 338 Table, the Trailer. 339 The Boy Chief. 340 Tim, the Trailer. 341 Red Ax, the Giant. 342 Stella, the Spy. 343 White Avenger. 344 The Indian King. 345 The Long Trail. 346 Kirk, the Guide. 347 The Phantom Trail. 348 The Apache Guide. 349 The Mad Miner. 350 Keen-eye, the Ranger. 351 Blue Belt, the Guide. 352 On the Trail. 353 The Specter Spy. 354 Old Bald-head. 355 Red Knife, the Chief. 356 Sib Cone, Trapper. 357 The Bear-Hunter. 358 Bashful Bill, the Spy. 359 The White Chief. 360 Cortina, the Scourge. 361 The Squaw Spy. 362 Scout of '76. 368 Spanish Jack. 364 Masked Spy. 365 Kirke, the Renegade. 366 Dingle, the Outlaw, 367 The Green Ranger. 368 Montbars, Scourge. 369 Metamora. 370 Thornpath, Trailer. 371 Foul-weather Jack. 372 The Black Rider.

374 The Lake Rangers. 375 Alone on the Plains. 376 Phantom Horseman. 877 Winona. 378 Silent Shot. 379 The Phantom Ship, 380 The Red Rider. 381 Grizzly-Hunters. 382 The Mad Ranger. 383 The Specter Skipper. 384 The Red Coyote. 385 The Hunchback. 386 The Black Wizard. 387 The Mad Horseman. 388 Privateer's Bride. 389 Jaguar Queen. 390 Shadow Jack. 391 Eagle Plume. 392 Ocean Outlaw. 393 Red Slayer. 394 The Phantom Foe. 395 Blue Anchor. 896 Red-Skin's Pledge. 397 Quadroon Spy. 398 Black Rover. 399 Red Belt. 400 The Two Trails. 401 The Ice-Fiend. 402 The Red Prince. 403 The First Trail. 404 Sheet-Anchor Tom. 405 Old Avoirdupois. 406 White Gladiator. 413 White Serpeut. 414 The Lost Captain. 415 The Twin Trailers. 416 Death's Head Ranger. 417 Captain of Captains. 418 The Warrior Princess. 470 Young Mustanger. 419 The Blue Band. 420 The Squaw Chief. 421 The Flying Scout. 473 Old Zip. 422 Sonora Ben. 428 The Sea King. 424 Mountain Gid. 425 Death-Trailer.

426 The Crested Serpent. 427 Arkansas Kit. 428 The Corsair Prince. 429 Ethan Allen's Rifles. 430 Little Thunderbolt. 431 The Falcon Rover. 432 Honest Hand. 433 The Stone Chief. 434 The Gold Demon. 435 Eutawan, the Slayer. 436 The Masked Guide. 437 The Conspirators. 438 Swiftwing, the Squaw. 439 Caribou Zip. 440 The Privateer. 441 The Black Spy. 442 The Doomed Hunter. 443 Barden, the Ranger. 444 The Gray Scalp. 445 The Peddler Spy. 446 The White Canoe. 447 Eph Peters. 448 The Two Hunters. 449 The Traitor Spy. 450 The Gray Hunter. 451 Little Moccasin. 452 The White Hermit. 453 The Island Bride. 454 The Forest Princess. 455 The Trail Hunters. 456 Backwoods Banditti. 457 Ruby Roland, Girl Spy. 458 Laughing Eyes. 407 Blue Clipper.
408 Red Dan.
409 The Fire-Eater.
401 Sumter's Scouts.
409 Blackhawk.
402 The Five Champions.
403 The Two Guards.
404 Onindaro. 459 The Mohegan Maiden. 464 Quindaro. 465 Rob Rusk 465 Rob Ruskin. 466 The Rival Rovers 467 Ned Starling. 468 Single Hand. 469 Tippy, the Texan. 471 The Hunted Life. 472 The Buffalo Trapper. 474 Foghorn Phil. 475 Mossfoot, the Brave. 476 Snow-Bird.

The following will be issued in the order and on the dates indicated:

477 The Dragoon's Bride, 478 Old Honesty. Ready 179 Bald Eagle. Ready 180 The Black Princess.

373 The Helpless Hand.

81 The White Brave. Jan. 4th. 487 Jo Daviess' Client. Mar. 29. 32 Riflemen of the Miami. 488 Ruth Harland. April 12th.

484 The Brigantine. Feb. 15th. 485 Putnam Pomfret's Ward. March 1st.

486 Simple Phil. March 15th.

Ready Jan. 18th. 489 The Gulch Miners. April 26.

3 The Moose Hunter. Feb. 1. 490 Captain Molly. May 10th.

blished semi-monthly. For sale by all newsdealers; or sent post-paid: single ers, ten cents; six months (13 Nos.) $1.25; one year (26 Nos.) $2.50.